Egypt trying to smooth path between Israel and Syria

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Senior Egyptian officials have been actively working to jump-start the stalled peace process between Israel and Syria.

After meeting with Syrian President Hafez al-Assad in Damascus last week, Egyptian Foreign Minister Amre Moussa said Syria was ready to resume negotiations with Israel if they are based on the land-for-peace principle.

The previous Israeli Labor government, which was open to a territorial concession on the Golan Heights in exchange for security guarantees, suspended negotiations in March, after Syria refused to condemn a series of suicide bombings in Israel.

Netanyahu has called for a resumption of the talks without preconditions, but he also is opposed to any Israeli withdrawal from the Golan.

Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa, who accompanied Moussa to the airport, said Syria was ready to restart negotiations, "from the point where from they stopped."

Canada asked to help rebuild centre

By LEORA EREN FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Palestinian officials have urged Canada to help rebuild a partially Canadian-funded community centre that was demolished last week by the Municipality of Jerusalem.

The Canadian Embassy demanded an explanation for the razing of the Jerusalem building which served disabled youth and was one of several West Bank and Gaza projects supported by the Embassy's Canada Fund.

The demolition of the building – which was illegally constructed in the Moslem quarter of the Old City – unleashed a torrent of anger among Palestinians and was described as "poorly timed" and "insensitive" by Israeli opposition members.

Demolition "poorly timed"

"These attempts are part of a premeditated policy to Judaize Arab Jerusalem, to empty its inhabitants and to encourage settlement building inside Jerusalem's neighborhoods," charged Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat in response to the Aug. 27 demolition.

The act was one of several developments that prompted Arafat's call for civil disobedience last week. "Israel has started a war on Jerusalem," he declared.

Canada's chargé d'affaires in Tel Aviv, David Viveash, called the incident unfortunate and said that the embassy was examining the Palestinian request to rebuild the Bourj Laq-Laq centre, which had received $41,000 in Canadian funding. Viveash added that five members of the board of the centre were arrested by Israeli police after they erected tents on the site of the demolished building near the Herod Gate.

Israel's Foreign Ministry responded to Canadian demands for an explanation with a statement, noting that the destruction had been ordered by the municipality and not by any national authority.

"The building in question was constructed without a permit, and neither were the relevant plans deposited with the municipality," said the statement. "Moreover, warning notices which were posted over the past few months were conspicuously ignored by those responsible."

The News in Brief

ISRAEL

New Defence Pact

JERUSALEM – Israel and Turkey have signed an agreement for defence industry cooperation, the second defence pact between the two states.

Defence Ministry Director General David Ivry initialed the accord in Istanbul for the Israeli side.

A military training accord between Turkey and Israel that was signed in February brought Israeli jets to Turkish airspace, as well as a hail of criticism from Arab countries.

Shabbat Road Closure

JERUSALEM – Haredi officials said Wednesday that they would not cooperate with the committee set up by Transport Minister Yitzhak Levy to investigate the issue of closing streets on Shabbat, while secular leaders were also critical of the makeup of the committee, which has four religious and four secular members.

Finance Ministers Meet

JERUSALEM – Israeli Finance Minister Dan Meridor met with his Palestinian counterpart last week to discuss ways to ease the economic hardships of the Palestinians caused by the closure of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Red Cross Visits

JERUSALEM – The Palestinian Authority has agreed to let International Red Cross officials visit prisoners in jails in the autonomous areas.

The decision follows reports of harsh treatment and torture of political prisoners in the jails.

Until now, Palestinian security forces have refused to allow the international humanitarian organization into the lockups.

Train Run

JERUSALEM – Plans to establish a new rail line from Ashdod Port to the Gaza Strip, carrying both passengers and freight, were announced Tuesday night by National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon.

This will allow for increased trade between the Palestinian Authority and Israel, and decrease international imports and exports from the Strip, Sharon said.

Archaeological Site

JERUSALEM – An archaeological site yielding evidence of the destruction of the Second Temple has opened in Jerusalem, after two years of excavations.

The excavations, conducted by the Israel Antiquities Authority, reveal a paved Herodian street, with ruined shops along it.

Stone blocks weighing 45 to 50 tons each were integrated into the pavement. A complex drainage system and ritual baths were also exposed.

Composer Dies

JERUSALEM – Israeli composer Yair Rosenblum, whose "Peace Song" was the anthem of the Nov. 4 Tel Aviv rally where Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was slain, has died in Holon after a two-year illness. He was 52.

Reform Rabbis Ordained

NEW YORK – Two Reform rabbis for the Israel Progressive Movement were recently ordained at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion.

Over the past two decades, HUC-JIR's Israel Rabbinic Program has trained 16 men and two women as rabbis to lead Israel's Reform congregations, schools and institutions.

Domestic Violence

WASHINGTON – Jewish Women International will reach 3,000 rabbis this year with the third edition of its Resource Guide for Rabbis.

The guide is the latest salvo in JWI's campaign to educate the Jewish community about domestic abuse.

With sample sermons from all four branches of Judaism, this guide provides a unique perspective on the issue of domestic violence in the Jewish community.

Torah Scrolls Nabbed

MOSCOW – Torah scrolls were recently stolen from two synagogues in Minsk, the capital of Belarus.

The thefts occurred the same night, local community leaders said. The scrolls each have an estimated worth of $20,000.

JERUSALEM COMPLAINS ABOUT U.S. CRITICISM

Israel's Foreign Ministry has charged that the United States State Department was unjustified in equating Defense Minister Moshe Dayan's talk of a "permanent" Israeli regime in the occupied Arab territories with the statement by Egypt, Libya and Syria barring negotiations and peace with Israel.

Ministry spokesman Avraham Aviday said, "The speech by [Dayan] ...was an evaluation of the situation and expression of a point of view not meant to change the decisions of the Cabinet. In contrast, the Damascus statement is an official announcement by three Arab presidents which confirms there will be no peace and no negotiations with Israel."

MONTREALERS PLAN PRAYERS FOR SOVIET JEWS

High Holiday and Simchat Torah celebrations will, this year, include special prayers on behalf of the Jews in the Soviet Union. At a special meeting of Synagogue Council of Greater Montreal, arrangements were finalized for the circulation of a mass petition by synagogue members and seat holders to Jews in Holiday services. The synagogues will also participate in the Simchat Torah demonstration October 12th.

UJA launches its 1997 campaign

Emphasis being put on reaching new contributors

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's a sure sign that summer is nearing an end: the United Jewish Appeal launched its 1997 campaign last week, with a special emphasis this time on reaching out to those who have never contributed.

Over 1,000 supporters jammed the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts for the kick-off to United Jewish Appeal's (UJA) 79th annual drive. The glitzy event featured a multi-media presentation and a rousing performance by Shorashim, a group of six young singers from Israel.

Later in the week, troupe members were involved in a serious auto accident in Edmonton, where they were scheduled to open that city's UJA campaign. Despite injuries including a concussion and a broken arm, five of the six members performed anyway. They also kicked off UJA campaigns in Montreal and Hamilton.

The Toronto launch's overriding theme was Remembering Our Roots, and actor Al Waxman, the guest speaker, recounted his experiences with anti-Semitism in the city in the 1940s and '50s.

In the end, Waxman said, "to be a Jew and Canadian is not mutually exclusive."

The gathering heard that one in seven Jews in Toronto lives in poverty, and that continuing government cutbacks are making the work of Jewish agencies more difficult.

But the good news, campaign chair David Goldstein told The CJN, is that UJA's Three-Year Vision, put in place last year, has already raised some $16 million toward next year's campaign.

The plan asked donors to pledge a contribution over three years. Some 8,000 people did, providing a substantial kick-off to the '97, as well as the '98 campaigns.

UJA, the community's central distributor of charity dollars, has raised some $34 million in cash and pledges for 1996, said director of communications Howard English.

As of last year, the drive stopped setting a specific goal. Before that, the target was about $40 million.

Because next year's campaign has gotten off to such a good start, Goldstein explained, UJA staff will be able to concentrate their efforts on tapping those who have never made a donation.

And a special Challenge Fund will match, dollar for dollar, any pledge made by a new donor.

A 1994 study released by Brandeis University in the United States said that 41 percent of Toronto's Jews do not donate to UJA and 26 percent of Jewish households make no contribution to any Jewish charity.

"It's not because they don't want to," Goldstein said. "It's probably because they haven't been asked."

HELP FOR HAIR

HAVE YOUR HAIR PERMED, COLOURED AND HIGHLIGHTED, ALL IN BEAUTIFUL GLORIOUS CONDITION!

We have talked with Mr. Shelley, President of N.A.H.D., world-renowned and Owner of Shelley's Hairstyling. Shelley spent years of research and discovered the use of Amino Acids which "help restore chemically broken bonds in damaged hair."

He also discovered the use of Low Acid products. The P.H. level is a main ingredient. Just picture numbers from 1-12. Your natural hair level is about P.H.5. regular perms and hair colouring are a much higher P.H. and the higher you go, the more damage will occur. I concentrate on bringing down the P.H. levels of my perms and colours to lower than P.H. 5. which makes them a treatment for the hair. This is a true revolution."

Sometimes we lose our way. Either through haze, darkness or self-imposed disorientation we walk towards bright lights, foreign visions, embracing them, confusing them for our destiny. We fall away from the old way because we cannot see the familiar markers. Alas, some of us do not even know where to look for them.

The first survey ever conducted of Jewish day school graduates in the United States, undertaken by professors Alvin Schiff and Mareleyn Schneider, educator and sociologist respectively, may help direct us to those markers. The results are being compiled into 11 reports, the first three of which were recently released.

Last week I introduced readers to this survey, with the promise to write about some of the findings contained in the first three reports.

The survey was administered to 6,673 graduates of 13 elementary schools and 13 high schools located in 19 large and small Jewish communities in the Northeast, South Midwest and Western United States. Sixteen of the institutions identified themselves as centrist or modern Orthodox, five are under Conservative sponsorship, three are "trans-ideological" communal schools, and two are "right of centre" Orthodox yeshivot. For the analysis, the researchers consolidated Reform Jews with Reconstructionist Jews and agnostics with atheists and Jews who practised no religion. The respondents were all between 20 and 45 years of age.

Jewish day school grads surveyed

There is no Canadian content to the survey, but its findings are surely relevant and applicable, with appropriate allowances, to the unfolding experience of our community as well.

To convey even a minimally adequate sense of the contents of the reports, I shall quote extensively from them. The first report is an overview entitled The Jewishness Quotient of Jewish Day School Graduates: Studying the Effect of Jewish Education on Adult Jewish Behavior. It contains brief, clearly, even forcefully written introductory material which provides the historical and demographic backdrop for the survey.

The authors' defining hypothesis is the following: "There is a statistically significant relationship between Jewish day school attendance, adult Jewish behavior and involvement, and endogamous marital patterns.

"The more one stays in school, the stronger the relationships, regardless of the Jewish religious ideology of the school [my emphasis], the background of the parents, and other factors. In other words, adult Jewish behavior and involvement increases with the length of stay in Jewish day schools."

Of considerable significance, especially in light of the fact that the research was conducted under the auspices of Yeshiva University, is the fact that the hypothesis expressly excluded a preference for any one specific form of religious observance. The theory rests on the extent and intensity of the exposure to Jewish education not on its nature.

The hypothesis is subsequently proven.

The authors conclude thus (I reproduce part of the discussion from the first report): "Day school graduates are like other 20 to 40-year-old, white, middle class American Jews regarding country of birth and secular education. They significantly differ, however, in parental background, current Jewish observance, camp experience, visits to Israel, involvement in Jewish organizational life, patterns of intermarriage, and attitudes towards intermarriage.

"The home environment of Jewish day school graduates is much more Jewishly oriented than the average American Jewish family, indicating that there is a relationship between parental level of Jewishness and the matter of Jewish education of their progeny.

"The level of Jewish behavior (particularly Sabbath and kashrut observance) and Jewish organizational involvement of the 20 to 40-year-old day school graduates is dramatically higher than that of typical American Jews of this age group.

"There is a striking difference between day school alumni and the general Jewish population regarding visits to Israel. Whereas only 15 percent of American Jews have visited Israel, 89 percent of day school graduates have been to Israel on average four times. Moreover, about eight percent either have made aliyah or were living there at the time of the study.

"The most noticeable difference between Jewish day school graduates and other American Jews of their age is in the matter of intermarriage: actual experience and attitude toward it. Whereas the majority of Jews who married between 1985 and 1990, according to the 1990 National Jewish Population Survey (NJPS), married non-Jews, 4.5 percent of Jewish day school graduates, who generally married between 1975 and 1990, are intermarried and over 80 percent object to their progeny intermarrying."

The second report is entitled Far-Reaching Effects of Extensive Jewish Day School Attendance: The impact of Jewish education on Jewish behavior and attitudes. Among its many categorical findings, I shall reproduce only one: "In general, with few exceptions, regardless of type of school, the numbers of observant graduates increase with the amount of Jewish education. For those from Orthodox schools, graduation from high school indicates that 83 percent will keep kosher at home and 72 percent outside the home. Sixty-nine will observe traditional Sabbath rites. For those from Conservative schools, 63 percent of high school alumni keep kosher at home and 47 percent keep kosher outside the home. Trans-ideological graduates exhibit a similar degree of kashrut observance: 60 percent at home, 50 outside the home."

The third report is called Fortifying and Restoring Jewish Behavior: The interaction of home and school. The key parts of its conclusion are: "Family values alone will not ensure Jewish continuity. A comprehensive, enduring Jewish education program is critical for continuance of Jewish identity for the generations to come. It strengthens their Jewish observance patterns, encourages involvement in Jewish communal activity, and engenders strong feeling against intermarriage...

"A combination of extensive Jewish education, bolstered by a positive family environment and other Jewish experiences, will prevent further erosion and contribute significantly to the continuity of American Jewry."

The survey is available from Yeshiva University, Department of Public Relations, 500 West 185th St., New York, N.Y. 10033-3201. I recommend it to the leaders of our community.

The remaining eight reports will be released over the course of the next 12 months. MBD

Hate crimes report a little too late: CJC

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A report prepared for the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police that outlines the seriousness of hate crimes is "better late than never," according to Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress.

The report, while "commendable," would have been better timed if it had been released two years ago when hate group activities were at their peak, Farber said.

In the interim, many leaders of white supremacist groups have been convicted of various offences and are in jail or out on bail, he said.

"Police must learn that these things need immediate attention," he added.

Sgt. Dino Doria of Metro Toronto's hate crime unit had a different take on the release of the report. He said it "indicates that hate crimes are becoming a larger priority" for police.

Since the Metro unit was created in 1993, hate groups have taken their propaganda to the Internet and forged international links, prompting more interest from police, he said.

On the local scene, police have responded to hate group activities by adopting a multi-faceted approach that includes educating youth about the dangers posed by racist groups.

Doria said the police unit recorded 101 hate crimes occurrences in the first six months of 1996, down 32 percent from the same period the year before. Most of those occurrences involve vandalism, assaults and uttering threats, he said.

The report released last week, titled Hate Crimes in Canada; In Your Back Yard, argued that hate groups undermine the fabric of democratic society and should not be treated as fringe phenomena.

Hate groups have permeated Candian society and target blacks, Jews, South Asians and gays for crimes ranging from verbal abuse to murder, the report stated.

The report also noted the Internet is being used to distribute hate material that would otherwise be prohibited under Canadian law. Material posted in the United States is freely available in Canada, the report added.

Tradition

Paul Stern, President

I remember when I was very small, I used to sit in shul on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippr snuggled up to my Saba. I'd listen to Kol Nidre mezmorized by the beauty of the words and the music . . .

And when it was time for the Shofar to sound, I'd close my eyes and puff out my cheeks and pretend that it was me blowing . . .

And there was nothing more delicious than my mother's chicken soup or my Aunt Clara's desserts.

After all these years, all the familiarity, I still look forward to Yom Tov with great excitement. Now I celebrate these times with my family and I know these traditions will carry on.

In this changing world hold on to the things you can rely on

Wishing you and your family a very Happy, Healthy, Prosperous New Year.

Kalejs blames Russians for massacres

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a statement to an Immigration officer, alleged Nazi war criminal Konrads Kalejs claimed that 27,800 Latvian Jews were killed by Russian forces and not by the Nazis and their Arajs Kommando (AK) collaborators.

"The Russians were responsible for those killings," Kalejs told Immigration officer Rodriguez in September 1995. Further attempting to explain his past, Kalejs said "information I have in my possession through my common-law wife revealed that one of the witnesses that testified against me was a Russian intelligence officer. This information was found in the archives of Riga."

Kalejs' statement was contained in a report prepared by Rodriguez based on two interviews with Kalejs in September 1995. Kalejs was referring to testimony videotaped in Latvia as part of a U.S. deportation proceeding against him. Kalejs was ordered removed from the United States for his wartime involvement in the persecution of civilians as part of the Arajs Kommando (AK).

After being deported from the United States, he attempted to enter Canada in 1994. He left for a time and returned in September 1995. He was interviewed on landing at Pearson International Airport on Sept. 3 by Rodriguez and then again on Sept. 7.

Armed on the second occasion with a U.S. court decision in the case, Rodriguez asked Kalejs about the accusation that he was involved in the murder of 27,800 Jews.

That's when Kalejs attempted to place responsibility for the murders on the Soviets. Kalejs also told Rodriguez that U.S. courts relied on testimony from "Russian people who were forced to say what they want; otherwise the Russian officials were going to send them to Siberia."

Testifying in Latvia for the U.S. proceeding, former members of the Arajs Kommando identified Kalejs as a senior lieutenant in the unit, which was involved in numerous massacres of civilians — including the mass shootings of 27,800 Latvian Jews.

Last week, Kalejs's former brother in law, Alfreds Putnins, testified on videotape — reluctantly — about Kalejs. Putnins said he did not wish the evidence taped and played outside of a U.S. courtroom because he wanted to protect his son in the United States.

Putnins said he barely knew Kalejs even though he married Kalejs' sister, Olga, in 1942. He spent most of the war at the front away from his wife and barely met Kalejs, he said.

Putnins said he had no first-hand information that Kalejs served in the Salaspils concentration camp, "but I know that he went there ... I think it was towards the end of the war ... My wife said her brother worked at Salaspils."

(Other evidence has placed Kalejs as head of an AK unit that guarded the camp, in which civilians were brutalized and killed.)

Putnins also testified he only learned of Kalejs' wartime activities after 1945. He said he knew his brother-in-law was a first lieutenant, but he did not know in which unit he served. During the war he never heard of the Arajs Kommando, he added.

However, U.S. attorney Aron Goldberg pointed out that in July 1985, Putnins signed a protocol at the Soviet procurator's office in which he stated that "somewhere in 1942, from my wife, I found out that her brother ... was in the the Arajs Kommando, as if he were a commander of a platoon or a company."

Explaining the discrepancy, Putnins said in 1985 he was relying on second-hand information.

Goldberg also pointed out that in 1987 Putnins said he last saw Kalejs in 1942, but that he told the Soviet procurator in 1985 that he saw Kalejs in February or March 1944 "and he was wearing an SS uniform at that time."

Putnins claimed the previous testimony was "not written here precisely."

Goldberg also pointed out that in 1985, Putnins identified Kalejs as a commander of a company of guards at Salaspils "but today you said you do not know what activities [he] was engaged in at Salaspils."

Putnins said he didn't know what duties Kalejs was involved in and that he only learned after the war that he commanded a company of guards there.

CJC deals with holiday security issues

Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region has created a "formalized structure" to ensure the community's security needs are met, especially during the High Holy Days.

"While we do not directly provide security for community institutions, Congress acts as a resource to all organizations, and coordinates security within the Jewish community," said Ellen Cole, chair of the region's community relations committee. "This is a role and responsibility undertaken by CJC regions across the country."

On the national level, Congress has produced a revised manual, Security Measures for Community Organizations. It provides guidelines on security precautions for Jewish organizations and is available from CJC offices across the country. In Ontario, requests can be made by calling (416) 635-2883, ext. 176.

CJC Ontario region Chair Moshe Ronen summarized CJC's efforts to ensure security is maintained. "In addition to distributing the security booklet, Ontario region convenes an annual security meeting, inviting representatives of all Greater Toronto Area synagogues, Jewish schools, institutions, and organizations," he said. "Representatives of local, provincial, and often national police and security agencies attend the meeting to discuss proactive steps to ensure safety. Those meetings remind all members of the Jewish community that we cannot take security for granted."

In addition to the annual meeting, Ontario region circulates security alerts to all synagogues, schools and institutions at times when potential threats are perceived to be at higher level.

"We maintain very close cooperation with all police forces and other security agencies to ensure that our institutions are properly informed," said Steven Shulman, associate director of community relations for Congress. "In Toronto, the Board of Jewish Education helps us disseminate information to Jewish schools. We also ensure that security information is provided to all Ontario federations, synagogues, and other institutions outside the Greater Toronto Area because security is not just a big city concern."

Shulman stressed that the answer to security concerns is "not fear, but rather prudence. The key to security is vigilance on the part of all members of the Jewish community. In recent years, we have noticed Jewish institutions in the province sharpen their focus on security issues. While Canada is very safe, we are always cognizant of internal and external threats."

"We are not currently aware of any specific threat to Jewish community institutions," stated Cole. "However, prior to the High Holy Days, we ask that all institutions ensure that adequate security precautions are in place for the entire year."

Saudis top weapons purchaser

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Saudi Arabia continues to be Canada's best weapons customer, with purchases totalling nearly $168 million last year.

However, that's down from the $280 million the Saudis spent on Canadian military goods in 1994, according to an annual report from Canada's Foreign Affairs department, tabled in Parliament recently by minister Lloyd Axworthy.

Axworthy said he was "pleased" to note that the total value of Canadian military exports dropped last year by 12 percent over the year before, to $447 million from $507 million.

But the report does not cover over $600 million in sales to the United States because the U.S. is not considered a foreign market.

Axworthy said he wants to make Canada "an even more responsible player in the global military goods market . . . I intend to tighten the rules further to ensure that our exports do not end up in the wrong hands."

The minister has long called for a reduction in Canadian arms sales and export permit approvals, which skyrocketed following the Gulf War. Critics say Canada jumped aboard the gravy train of Western arms sales to the Saudis after the conflict.

Before the war, Canada avoided selling arms in the Middle East because the region was considered too explosive.

Israel has watched Canadian arms exports closely since the Gulf conflict, mainly because of increased sales to Arab countries still technically at war with the Jewish state.

The Saudis are still said to be interested in buying three fully-armed Canadian-built frigates, estimated at $500 million each. In 1992, Israel's embassy in Ottawa expressed concern at the prospect.

Since the early 1990s, the Saudis have bought about 1,000 light armored vehicles (LAVs) from General Motors of Canada, with about 600 more scheduled before 1998. The LAV is an eight-wheel, fully-armed personnel carrier that was used in the Gulf War.

In addition to the LAVs, the Saudis last year bought Canadian-made electronic equipment for military use and other specialized equipment for military training.

Canada's policy is to "closely control" arms sales to countries which pose a threat to Canada or its allies; which are embroiled in conflict; are under UN sanctions; or whose governments have serious human rights problems and where it's feared Canadian weapons may be used against the civilian population.

Canada has never sold arms to Israel because of the threat of hostilities there. In 1994, Defence Minister David Collenette promised to review Canada's ban on weapons sales to the Jewish state.

But the annual report shows Canada's military sales to Israel last year totalled just $45,000, the same as the year before. Israel bought components for engines, navigation systems and sonar equipment. Most experts believe Israel is not interested in Canadian-made weapons.

Canadian sales to Turkey quadrupled last year over 1994, and Tunisia became a new buyer of Canadian military goods.

In all, Canada last year sold $172 million worth of military goods to eight Arab nations.

Rob Ritter of the Canada-Israel Committee told The CJN he thinks Axworthy "is interested in making changes, but you can't dismantle a whole establishment overnight."

Israel's embassy in Ottawa had no comment on the latest figures.

York student 'connects' with life in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite major upheaval in Israel over the past 12 months, York University student Roni Felsen is convinced he couldn't have picked a better time to study at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

It was "a crazy year" — bombings, the assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, government changes — but Felsen, 21, can't imagine having spent it anywhere else. "I probably would have felt a lot less connected."

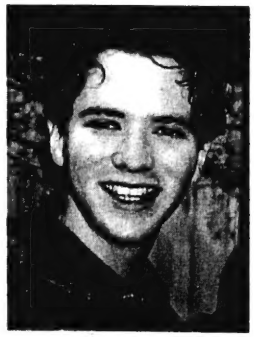
To make the most of his year, Felsen sought to become involved outside of the campus, teaching fitness classes at two luxury hotels, substituting as an English teacher at a Jerusalem public school and attending protest rallies as an observer.

"A lot of people stopped taking buses, or didn't even leave the campus," recalls Felsen. "I figured you could hide for a year, or take advantage of where you are."

Felsen followed the Israeli elections closely, and has a collection of over 100 bumper stickers collected at political rallies. Although he is a day school graduate and had visited Israel four times previously, his knowledge of Israeli politics was sketchy prior to his year away, he said.

Among his courses at the university's Rothberg School for Overseas Students was Israeli Foreign Policy, which included an overview of Israel's political system. Felsen is entering his fourth year in York's Bachelor of Arts/Bachelor of Education program, majoring in French and Education, and will receive credit for his year in Jerusalem. He was one of 70 Canadian students, among them 40 Torontonians, attending the school last year.

The highlight of his intellectual experience was a course on Medieval Biblical Commentators taught by renowned nonagenarian professor Nechama Leibowitz.



Roni Felsen

On an informal basis, his education was furthered by interaction with other dorm students. "I really lucked out," he said.

In addition to overseas students, his floormates included Jewish Israelis (Israeli-born as well as Ethiopian and Russian immigrants) and Arab Israelis.

Despite their "big diversity of opinions," the Rabin assassination unified them in sadness, Felsen said.

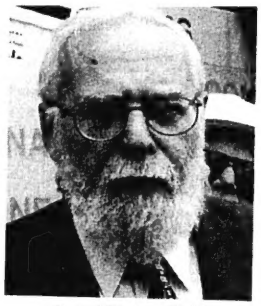
Labor victory would have doomed Israel: rabbi

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN



Rabbi Sholom Gold

TORONTO – Israel would not have survived another four years of the Labor party government of Shimon Peres, Rabbi Sholom Gold, a leading figure of Israel's National Religious Party (Mafdal), told a Toronto-area audience recently.

"Because they (the Labor coalition) didn't think it was possible, they failed to foresee the disaster that was to befall them," said Rabbi Gold, speaking at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation on the topic After the Election: The New Israel.

The Laborites refused to believe pre-election polls that told them Benjamin Netanyahu and the Likud might win the election, Rabbi Gold said. "They were living with the same mistake that was made on erev Yom Kippur in 1973. The government at the time believed that Egypt and Syria wouldn't attack. Because they didn't believe it would happen, they weren't able to see the truth staring them in the face."

According to Rabbi Gold, the previous government had an undisclosed plan to allow the partition of Jerusalem.

"From the beginning of the Oslo process, they continually, constantly, viciously lied to the people," he said. "They said over and over again that Jerusalem would always be the undivided home of the Jewish people – and every time they were lying."

The former Brooklynite rabbi who now leads the congregation Kehilat Zichron Yoseph in Har Nof, Jerusalem, spoke angrily of the previous government's treatment of the religious right: "They held the right in absolute contempt. We were abused and vilified. We were not merely the outsiders, we were the ones who had to be crushed and destroyed.

"The government didn't understand that we would pay them back for it. They didn't understand that the day of judgment was going to come and that we would use the power of the ballot box."

Days before the election, members of Israel's religious right "were working together with a sense of tremendous mission," Rabbi Gold said. "You spoke to the people in the streets, there was a ruach, you could feel the victory in the air."

Chabad's 11th-hour sign and bumper sticker campaign, in which the religious group proclaimed Netanyahu their choice, will be studied for years to come "like the Battle of the Bulge or Entebbe," said Rabbi Gold. "It hit the country two days before the election, and there was no way for Labor to fight back."

The defeated Labor government discouraged aliyah or Jewish immigration, Rabbi Gold asserted, knowing that most olim would be religious Jews.

"Now we've got to put aliyah back on the Jewish agenda," he said. "Start visiting, and start sending your kids. Israel is a much happier place than it was before."

Rabbi Gold's visit was sponsored by the Bet El twinning committee of Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in conjunction with One Israel and Mizrachi Organization of Canada.

Moderation called for

The community centre in the Old City of Jerusalem was bulldozed last week because the construction on its site was illegal. City Hall took steps to enforce the law. It demolished the building. No doubt, however, its demolition was more than merely a municipal act protecting the integrity of rules, permits and regulations. It was a national act protecting the integrity of Israel's claim to sovereignty over an undivided Jerusalem.

Israel's claim is not a recent one. It does not originate with the two-month-old government of Benjamin Netanyahu. It is as old as time itself. And it was also the policy of Netanyahu's predecessor, Shimon Peres.

As Canadian taxpayers, of course, we regret the apparent waste of the more than $30,000 donated by the government to the project. But Canadian officials on the scene must bear the brunt of the blame for not properly ensuring the disbursement of funds to appropriate channels or for appropriate purposes. Israel has stated as repeatedly and as consistently as snowfall in Canadian winter that it would never again allow Jerusalem's status as a united city to be compromised.

The bulldozing of the unfinished community centre must therefore be seen in that light. And most people do. Canada's largest daily, the Toronto Star, chose to cover the story in a different light, however, as if it were under a huge spotlight, with alarms sounding in full siren.

On the second page of the edition of Aug. 28, a two-inch, boldfaced headline announced: "Canadian-funded Arab centre razed".

Accompanying the article was an editorial entitled"Anxious in Israel," in which, among many dubious assertions, was this: "Israel's relations with the rest of the world are under strain."

The Star's coverage was neither balanced nor proportionate. Nor was it accurate. Two months is too short a time for the "rest of the world" to have established any formal experience with the still-fresh government in Israel. Indeed, most of the "rest of the world" is still waiting for more definitive policy decisions from Netanyahu. There have been no shifts in bilateral relations with any of Israel's friends, foes or trading partners. No one, other than the Star's editorial writer, has detected any strain in those bilateral relations.

Despite the "strain" between Yasser Arafat and Prime Minister Netanyahu, Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) communicate regularly. The prime minister's chief foreign affairs advisor, Dore Gold, meets with his Palestinian counterpart. Finance Minister Dan Meridor and Maher al-Masri, the PA member in charge of economics and trade, have resumed regular meetings and are undertaking joint, cooperative endeavors. Last week, David Levy spoke with Arafat, urging him to tone down the rhetoric, but also assuring him of Israel's good faith. Minister of Defence, Yitzhak Mordechai also assured the PA of Israel's intentions while similarly calling on Arafat to speak more softly: "We intend to continue the dialogue between us and the PA and to seek ways for a solution in the future. I don't advise intensifying statements of the situation but to take a moderate approach and find better ways for progress to the benefit of all sides." (Editor's italics)

In the still-settling dust after the May 29 elections, moderation is indeed called for, in the reportage by the Toronto Star too.

The Bishop's role in Kielce pogrom

Re: Sheldon Kirshner's article "Circumstances surrounding 1946 pogrom remain a mystery" (CJN July 4).

We wish to address just one matter as illustrative of the misinformation that pervades this topic. Citing Michael Borwicz, Kirshner states that three weeks before the pogrom, the bishop of Kielce refused to issue an appropriate pastoral letter; that on the day of the pogrom the bishop's office refused to grant a connection upon receiving a call from a local Jewish leader; and that in the wake of the pogrom the bishop declined to sign a statement denouncing the onslaught.

Bishop Kaczmarek was far removed from Kielce for health reasons for two months. Upon his return on July 24, he immediately struck a special church commission to investigate the incident. His 18-page report was secretly delivered to the U.S. ambassador, Arthur Bliss Lane, who voiced complete agreement with its conclusion: "It [the pogrom] was not spontaneous, but a carefully organized plot."

On July 4, on learning of the melee, two groups of priests set out for Planty Street to intervene, only to be turned back by the authorities. Why? The state authorities also reneged on a joint state-church statement worked out with the bishop's office in the aftermath of the pogrom. Undaunted, the office issued statements of condemnation which were immediately read in every parish in the diocese: "This deliberate massacre is a crime that cries out for Divine retribution, and as such is deserving of total and categorical condemnation."

The authorities were livid and plotted their revenge. Bishop Kaczmarek, along with other members of the clergy who spoke out against the pogrom, was eventually arrested by Colonel Jozef Swiatlo (Licht). He was tortured (losing his health and 19 teeth in the process) and personally threatened by the likes of Jozef Rozanski (Goldberg), the director of the investigation department of the Ministry of State Security. He was sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment after a show trial at which his defence was torpedoed by Mieczyslaw Maslanko, the director of defence attorneys. The charges — espionage, anti-state activity — were so patently absurd that after the ouster of the Stalinists, his conviction was promptly overturned.

Keep an eye on Arafat

For several decades we have seen a gradual erosion of the free world and media support for the State of Israel. The Israelis are called hard-liners and are accused of being against the peace process.

Even though Benjamin Netanyahu has been officially elected by the Israeli population, the world media and a segment of the Jews in Israel and North America find this difficult to accept. There is a Bibi-watch program, but these same observers never dreamed of setting up a Yasser-watch program. The article on the destruction of Israel in the Palestinian Covenant has not as yet been revoked by the PLO, although Yasser Arafat said it would be. Only a worldwide cover-up, helped along by the most powerful of the media and by many influential Jewish leaders and organizations, who whitewash and defend Arafat and blame Netanyahu, have given the world the impression that the PLO Covenant has been changed. The deceptive hoax continues. The text of the Palestinian National Covenant remains as it was.

Netanyahu has made it clear that he will continue negotiations with the Arab community. Is there anything wrong or extremist in the view that a nation has rights to safe and secure borders?

Just tell Quebec the truth

I respectfully suggest the following to Heritage Minister Sheila Copps: Speak out loud and clear and give Quebec specific information on the price of separation. Surely, your government has made studies and could without fear indicate the cost in economic, social and political terms of Quebec's separating. This need not be in the form of a threat, but a simple calculation based on a review of the existing value of buildings in Quebec, pension funds, tax liabilities and consequences which would inevitably flow from a separation from Canada. You must assume that the average Canadian both in Quebec and in the rest of Canada is capable of understanding in real terms the implications of separation.

All Canadians are sick and tired of hearing about sovereignty association, economic partnerships and political linkage. You and your government must show once and for all its commitment to a united Canada where Quebec has its equal place together with all other provinces and a mutual respect for the language and religion of all Canadians. If truth offends, then so be it.

Jews' role in Canada's political process

By SHELDON AND JUDY GODFREY

PART II

"The question you have to ask," says Barry Campbell, MP for Toronto-St. Paul's "is whether it would matter to us as Jews if at some future date there were no Jews in the House of Commons."

From the one Jewish MP elected between 1867 and 1917, Jews were elected to the Canadian House of Commons in ever increasing numbers until 1969, when Jews were elected in more than three times the proportion to their percentage of the population at large.

Henry Nathan, who was elected as the Conservative member of parliament from Vancouver Island in 1872, remained in office for only two years. But it was not until 1917, with the election of Samuel W. Jacobs as MP for Montreal-St. Lawrence, that the period of continuous representation in the House of Commons by at least one Jew from Montreal began. Toronto has had Jewish members of parliament from the time of the election of Samuel Factor in 1935 to the present, except for short period after David Croll, the MP for Spadina, was appointed to the Senate in 1955. Winnipeg has also had a large number of Jewish members of parliament over the years since A.A. Heaps was first elected in 1921.

By 1969, the year nine Jewish MPs went to Ottawa representing all the major political parties, most of Canada's provinces had sent Jews to the House of Commons. An impressive number have served as Canadian cabinet ministers since that same year, when Herbert Gray became the first Jew to be appointed and take his place in the cabinet. These include: Barnet Danson, Robert Kaplan, Gerald Weiner and Sheila Finestone.

In the current House of Commons, there are representatives of many cultural and religious groups. There are now three Jewish MPs, all Liberals, who are represented in almost equal proportion to the percentage of Jews in Canada.

In view of these facts, the first question should be: "Why aren't there more Jewish members of parliament today?"

The difficulties of anyone being an MP are apparent: Exposure to the public, particularly at election time, is not always a positive experience for MPs. Acknowledgements of the hard work done conscientiously by MPs in the public interest are rare, while gratuitous criticism is common. Financial disclosure requirements, necessary to avoid conflicts of interest, are nonetheless onerous and get in the way of continuing one's legitimate business while in office. Time spent in Ottawa away from home puts real pressure on family relationships usually requiring two separate residences in different cities. Pay is relatively poor – even the civil service, where Jews are now highly placed, pays more.

And after Ottawa what? When the term is finished an MP could be out of touch with a former profession or career. Jobs may not be waiting; appointment to boards or commissions for ex-MPs are almost always publicly criticized as being partisan and not based on merit.

Indeed we are fortunate to have had as many excellent MPs willing to face the onerous responsibility with such devotion.

In the United States, where the situation of members of Congress is similar, Jews make up about 10 per cent of members, compared to the present one per cent in Canada. Some of this difference may be due to the higher pay for members of the American Congress and their better chances of finding work after their terms in politics are completed, but it does not satisfactorily explain the relative current low percentage of Canadian Jewish MPs.

The next question is whether it matters if the percentage of Jewish MPs in Canada is low. Here are some thoughts to consider:

• Rabbi Martin S. Cohn of Beth Tikvah Congregation in Richmond, B.C., reminds us that Jews living in the Diaspora strive to be "a light unto the nations" – with a profound sense of purpose. By the willingness of the Jewish people to endure "a life lived on the cusp," we can keep at bay the dark forces that threaten to overwhelm us all. "Living among the nations is not just a useful thing for Jews to do," he writes. "It is tikkun olam in its highest sense, a chance to redeem the world." The political role of Jews in Canada, to take Rabbi Cohn's words a step further, is to work to create a just society – a place where all are equally entitled to the favor and protection of the government. Such a society is one that is enriched by the contribution of the brightest and the best of its citizens, not one where only one class or group has the full opportunity for participation.

• It is worth remembering that while Jews have worked for these ideals from the beginning, many of these ideals were achieved when there were no Jews in office. Ezekiel Hart, Selim Franklin and others were followed by Jews who worked in and with other groups to effect the political process in the interest of equality – groups with names like the Baron de Hirsch Institute, the Jewish Legislation Committee and the Canadian Jewish Congress.

• "The number waxes and wanes," says Herb Gray, who, as Canada's longest serving present member of the House, should be in a position to know. Gray observes that since the 1960s, having "Jewish seats" in Parliament has not been an important issue. Some ridings with large Jewish populations have been very well represented by non-Jews; some ridings with few Jews have consistently elected Jewish MPs. Besides, there are many Jews elected to provincial and municipal office. Gray cites a recent trip to a Convention of World Jewish Parliamentarians in Israel where he was surprised at the large number of elected Jewish representatives from Canada's provincial legislatures.

• When a higher percentage of Jews was elected to public office, they participated in the enactment of legislation that levelled the playing field in the interest of equal opportunities for all. As a result, Jews and others are now able to participate fully, achieving positions at the highest levels of endeavors previously denied them: in the arts, the media, education, the civil service, the humanities, law, medicine, economics, finance, science, business and the senate.

• That job – levelling the playing field – has been significantly completed. We do not gainsay the economic difficulties being experienced by many Canadians, as evidenced by the persistent, high rate of national unemployment. But, Canada with its groundbreaking, longstanding traditions of respect for the equal status of individuals whose forefathers have come from different places, is about as close to being a just society as there is. This year, for the third consecutive time, the United Nations decided that Canada is the best place to live in the world.

No matter how many Jewish MPs are elected, their political role has always been, and will always be, to ensure that Canadian society continues to protect the hard won equal rights of its citizens that mark Canada's uniqueness.

Almost a 150 years after toleration was replaced by equality and enshrined into the law as a distinctive feature of Canadian society, the historic "conflict" between the two has re-emerged into the political and constitutional discourse of the country.

In the struggle to maintain the political and territorial integrity of Canada and accommodate the separatist threat from Quebec, some public figures are proposing constitutional accommodations, such as a "distinct society" to be later defined, whose long-range effect may impair the long-fought-for political equality which now marks the advanced legal landscape of this country.

Ironically, in a certain sense, we could be forced backwards by our own House of Commons and legislatures. In this sense, Jewish members of parliament, elected because of their equality, are on the horns of a dilemma.

If the price of national unity is a return to the old "toleration," will the changes to the Charter of Rights be more than Canadians can or should accept?

On the other hand, are the political and territorial implications of the break-up of Canada so far-reaching as to warrant payment of that high a price?

Can the price be paid alongside the legal assurances that no Canadians or groups of Canadians will be relegated to second class status?

What role can we reasonably expect our elected members of parliament, as individuals, to play in helping to resolve the national discourse between "toleration" and equality? Apart from the leadership of individual example and the contributions around the cabinet table or in caucus, what powers do individual MPs have to effect change or prevent undesirable legislation?

The parliamentary system imposes a severe discipline on party members, far more severe than that imposed by the presidential system of the United States. Individual MPs, who owe their election to their political party, cannot lightly oppose their own party in the House of Commons. Unlike in the United States, governments here can stand or fall with votes on major policy matters in parliament.

"Where do you draw your line in the sand?" asks MP Barry Campbell, in explaining the difficulty of voting in such circumstances. "You have to decide if a particular issue is the issue on which to take your stand." If you want to be around to fight another day, you have to "stay in the tent." Otherwise you can't expect to stay in the party.

As a result, Canadian politics leaves a heavier onus on "ordinary" citizens to become involved in the political process. That is, after all, the way many of Canada's basic rights were won when there were no Jews or other minorities in the House of Commons. Today, Jews in Canada are equal and are very secure in their rights. But no matter what our numbers, our politicians can't do everything for us. Government, in its broadest sense, is our responsibility as full and equal citizens.

In Canada, political rights are not lost by speaking out or by concerted political action. But, as with all precious things, we put them at risk through neglect, lack of awareness and indifference to the political process.

Thus, we must continue to elect MPs who excel. But we must also work with our government in enlightened political action.

We must continue to strive to be "a light among the nations," whether we have more or fewer Jewish members elected to the House of Commons. We must continue to live "on the cusp," to ensure that Canada grows and prospers as a just society, and to hope that the world will continue to be better for it.

PART I
Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

Whereas Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law:

Guarantee of Rights and Freedoms

1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

The Constitution Act of 1982 sets out Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Reproduced above is the Charter's first section. In their two-part essay, Sheldon and Judy Godfrey speculate about the possible impact of the national unity debate upon the future of the Charter.

On the road in Prague

This article and the following one are coming from Prague, where we are travelling.

Where can you hear a concert of classical pieces for cello and piano at 4:40 and then enjoy Dixieland at 6 while sipping coffee?

By Jean M. Gerber

Answer: The Kafka house and Cafe Milena in Prague. This day of music in the Bohemian air was our introduction to the city of the Golem.

By the 10th century (900 CE), there were Jewish merchants and craftsmen living below the castle above the Vltava/Moldau River. Jews later moved across the river to the present site of the former ghetto, the Josefov, named in honor of the emperor who began their emancipation. Our tour of that area was poignant and forceful as we passed through reminders of Jewish history from the 14th to the late 20th centuries.

Our guide, Marketta, took us to the signature building of Jewish Prague, the Alte-Neue Shul, which dates from the 14th century. It begins below street level and reaches up to a sharp peak. Inside is the odor of centuries. Walls are flanked by wooden seats, the central bimah encircled by wrought iron, the women's section in a narrow side room which gives access to the sanctuary only through several narrow windows. Upstairs, the legend goes, lie the remains of Rabbi Loew's Golem, servant and protector of the Jews, who finally became their near destroyer until he "deactivated" his monster.

After the Crusade massacres, Jews were deemed royal property and alternately tolerated, taxed, expelled and entreated to return. The stately Maisel Synagogue now holds some of the artifacts of Czech Jewry. During Maisel's lifetime, Jews lived in security.

The Klausen Synagogue with its ornate ark was also built by community leaders. Wealthy Jewish families were benefactors of the Jewish and general community, since wealth made a Jew both valuable and vulnerable to the secular rulers.

Prague Jewry maintained pride in its own culture and in the city of Prague. It had its own guilds and societies, some with symbols similar to the Christian guilds (both Jewish and Christian butchers, for example, had a lion holding an axe). Prague was the first community in Europe to use the six-pointed star in its symbol — the Jews' hat with the star of David inside. At the famous battle of the Charles Bridge, both Jews and Christians repelled the invaders.

The Jews' hat, however, had a double meaning. Jewish men had to wear it outside the ghetto, thus proclaiming their identity and opening them to ridicule. On the other hand, if they were outside the ghetto, they could be on the king's business and molesting them could have dire consequences for the perpetrators.

We next visited the Pinchas Synagogue, built in the Renaissance style and now bare of ornament except for the central bimah and ark. Standing inside the iron-work of the bimah gave one a sense of the closeness to, yet separation from, the congregation.

The synagogue is bare, but around its walls are written the names of the Jews and the communities destroyed by the Nazis. Amid the serenity and coolness of the white-washed interior, the march of names of the dead forces itself on the visitor.

From the Pinchas, one enters the much photographed old cemetery. As each era filled the cemetery, a layer of earth was added, new graves dug and the old stones lifted to stand next to new ones. Now commoner jostles aristocrat, rabbi and am-haaretz lie in each other's arms.

Finally one enters the building originally intended for use by the chevra kadisha, which has a display by the artists of Terezin. Over 20,000 drawings, our guide tells us, were hidden from the Nazis, from expert portraits to children's sketches. The artists were permitted to draw until it was discovered that they were drawing events from their ugly daily life. They were immediately deported to Auschwitz.

Marketta brings us out to the street and we look back over the cemetery at the Rudolfim, a huge building with statues of muscians lining its roof. She tells us a story. Is it true? Well, as Wiesel says, some things that never happened are true, while some things that happened cannot be true.

When the Germans occupied Prague, they summoned the Czech leaders and demanded that they remove the statue of the Jew Felix Mendelssohn. The officials went up, then descended and told the Germans that they were unable to decide which one was Mendelssohn. "That's your problem" snarled the Nazis, "Get up there and find him." The officials were dismayed, but one hit on a solution. They chose the statue with the biggest nose and presented it to the Nazis. The Germans become apoplectic with rage.

It was the statue of Richard Wagner.

Christians in Israel

It will come as a surprise to some that there is an organization called Association of Christians and Jews in Israel. It seems perfectly understandable that such a group would organize in the Diaspora and, in fact, the idea goes back to the United States in the late 1920s. At that time, a rabbi, a Catholic priest and a Protestant minister appeared on a public platform, and that was considered a near-sensation. Pretty soon the idea spread and in Canada, the Canadian Council of Christian and Jews became the locus for an organized promotion of amity.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

But why in Israel? Because there, roles are reversed: in the Diaspora Jews are a minority recognized by the majority; in Israel it is the reverse. There, Christians want to reinforce their civic status, for Israel is a democracy where the open acknowledgement of one's faith is a given, and where the practice of religion and the security of sacred places are assured by basic laws. For the last five years, the organization has published an eight-page bulletin entitled, Christians and Israel, a modest but interesting quarterly. In the latest issue, the lead article is Lebanon and Israel.

When the Jewish state arose, there was every indication that Lebanon, with its large Christian population, would keep it company; but largely because of Syrian interference, this amicable relationship never became a fact. Now, Christians in Lebanon are on the defensive, and that is true as well for the rest of the Near East and, in fact, for Asia as a whole. A recent study by J. P. Valognes speaks of Life and Death of Christians in the Orient. "Will any Christians be left in the Orient in the third millennium?" asks the author, and he answers that due to the inability of Muslim society to accept another religion in its midst, the outlook is dark.

But what about Christians in Israel itself? They too suffer from the diminution of their faith in the Near East. Their sacred sites are of course safe and guaranteed by the state, but Christian Arabs — who form the majority of that faith in Israel — are under pressure from fellow Arabs who are Muslims.

A letter to Avvenire (Rome) reports that "in the Mass-books used by Palestinian Christians, the Bible has been mutilated. All the passages considered unacceptable to Muslims have been eliminated from the Arab version. Entire generations of Palestinian Christians have grown up denying God's alliance with Israel and the Jewishness of Jesus, of the Madonna, of the Apostles. To them, they were all Arabs!"

Another statement says that the relations between Islam and Christianity are today, for many, a source of preoccupation and a matter of great disquiet. In a recent edition, the American Catholic Register had this to say: "Most Christians — whose leadership has long fought for the formation of a secular Arab state in Israel — are not feeling particularly secure about a future which, they fear, could be hijacked by fundamental Islam."

It may well be that 25 years from now the only place where Christian communities have any chance of surviving in the Orient is in Israel.

Summer's the time for reading

Summer has always been an advantageous time for sorting out and reading the new books that are published during that leisure period each year. In the non-fiction category, however, the past season brought me a number of books whose reading occasioned differing degrees of sadness, disquiet and disappointment (in one case shock). Happily, the summer reading material also provided instruction, learning and pleasure.

By Arnold Ages

First the good news. James T. Patterson's Grand Expectations (Oxford), a kaleidoscopic history of the United States from 1945 to 1974, introduced me to a historian with the writing skill of William Manchester, the magisterial sweep of Winston Churchill and the interpretive powers of Arthur Schlesinger Jr.

Two books on the late Hannah Arendt, the brilliant German-Jewish political scientist and controversialist, one by Larry May and Jerome Kohn, the other by Richard Bernstein (both published by MIT Press) succeeded in instructing me and enhancing Arendt's reputation, not only as a perceptive student of history and politics, but as a scholar motivated deeply by her Jewish origins. Bernstein claims that Arendt was led to her theories about totalitarianism because she was "an engaged Jewish intellectual."

There are many such people found in People of the Book (Wisconsin) an anthology of 30 probing essays on Jewish life edited by Jeffrey Rubin-Dorsky and Shelley Fisher Fishkin. The best is a piece by Gary Saul Morson, a specialist in Slavic studies who presents a blistering critique of apologists for anti-Semitism, who find reasons to explain away the Jew-hatred found in great writers like Fyodor Dostoyevsky. Morson deplores the way critics become defence attorneys for such writers, "forgetting their loyalty to truth."

I also had a very positive reaction to a Festschrift in honor of Richard Rubenstein (University Press of America). Almost 60 different contributors offer both personal and scholarly tribute to the author of After Auschwitz and The Cunning of History, a thinker who, despite his current administrative dalliance with the Moonies, has displayed an intellectual boldness in theological matters, especially in dealing with the Holocaust.

It is on the question of the Holocaust that my summer reading also produced a measure of shock. Alan S. Rosenbaum's Is The Holocaust Unique? (Westview) is one of the few books I have ever seen in which the author of an introduction repudiates, to a large degree, the contents of the book — and rightly so. Some of the collaborators in it piggy back on the revisionist syndrome, by denying the uniqueness of Jewish suffering and stressing what is seen as the equally serious genocide against the Armenians and the American Indians.

Disappointment is the word I would use to describe my reaction to Francois Mitterand and Elie Wiesel's Memoir In Two Voices (Arcade). Unfortunately the fault lies not with Wiesel, but with the translation of the original French into an English which betrays Wiesel's noble intent. There are two mistranslations of vital materials in this memoir, which make both Mitterand and Wiesel say things in English that are bereft of common sense.

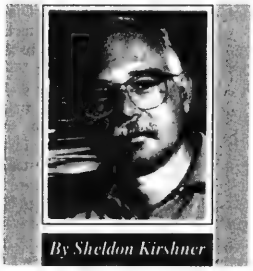
Hitler's toxic brain is the subject of Eugene Davidson's The Unmaking of Adolf Hitler (Mussouri), another let-down for me. Davidson trots down well-known pathways in this reconstruction of the political career of Hitler. Davidson must be somewhat of a masochist, because he has actually read and digested Hitler's major speeches and devotes page after page to presenting their malevolent contents. To what end? I kept asking myself.

The worst essay of the summer season was George Steiner's Through That Glass Darkly, found in his book No Passion Spent (Yale). Unless Steiner is the world's greatest writer of irony, he has written an unspeakably obtuse essay, in which he finds the origins of and the justification for the Holocaust in the Jews' refusal to accept Jesus! As Mrs. Astor is reputed to have said on the Titanic: "I asked for ice but this is too much!

The Kirshner File

A woman of exemplary accomplishments

Long before the modern feminist movement shifted into high gear, Sylvia Ostry was one of its role models, a woman of exemplary accomplishments.



By Sheldon Kirshner

For more than two decades, she was the consummate Ottawa insider — Canada's chief statistician, deputy minister of consumer and corporate affairs, chair of the Economic Council of Canada, deputy minister of international trade and, finally, the ambassador for multilateral trade.

And for four years, she headed up the Paris-based department of economics and statistics at the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development.

Today, Ostry is chair of the Centre for International Studies at the University of Toronto, a nonpartisan, inter-disciplinary research organization which studies the economic, political and legal relationships between sovereign states.

And Ostry — a Companion of the Order of Canada and the recipient of 17 honorary university degrees — is also the chancellor of the University of Waterloo. In addition, she is a prolific writer of monographs and books, a busy consultant and a member of the board of several corporations.

Perusing her resume, one is tempted to ask how she manages to juggle so many balls in the air at once.

She smiles, having been asked the question before. "I'm compulsive," she explained, leaning forward, a cigarette between her fingers. "I'm a workaholic and have always been like that."

During the course of a normal day, she devours a raft of domestic and foreign newspapers and specialized journals, writes, takes phone calls, receives visitors and otherwise attends to the business of the Centre for International Studies.

"I enjoy this," she said. "It's not work to me. I take great satisfaction from it."

By common consent, Ostry is one of the movers and shakers in the rarefied realm of international trade and finance.

Her advice has been sought by the World Trade Organization, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, the Canadian and Hungarian governments, the United Nations and research institutions in Israel, among others.

And as a company director, Ostry's brain is picked by the Power Financial Corporation, the Bank of Montreal and the Inter-American Development Bank.

A frequent traveller to European and Asian capitals (she had just returned from a trip to Singapore), Ostry is most at home when, surrounded by crooked stacks of documents and clippings, she is writing one of her learned articles or books.

Since polishing off her first monograph in 1962 (Labor Policy and Labor Economics in Canada), Ostry has churned out a niagara of monographs and articles, the topics ranging from Canada's wage structure and labor market to regional trading blocs and the Japanese economy.

From her pen (or computer) has poured forth a steady stream of books, most notably Governments and Corporations in a Shrinking World: The Search for Stability and The Halifax G-7 Summit: Issues on the Table. Currently, she is working on Who's On First: The Post-Cold War Trading System, scheduled to be published in 1997.

Married to Bernard Ostry, the former chair of TVOntario, she was born in Winnipeg's north end, where luminaries such as the diplomat Alan Gotlieb and the CBC producer/commentator Larry Zolf were raised.

Ostry's father Morris, who hailed from the Russian city of Odessa, was in the pulp wood paper business. And her mother Bess, whose father came from Danzig, was a school teacher who taught Ostry how to read at the age of 2½. Ostry's only other sibling, Fred, is a chemical engineer and an adjunct professor at the University of Victoria.

She decided to study medicine at the University of Manitoba largely because she considered its anti-Semitic quota system a challenge to be surmounted. Until the 1950s, most Jewish doctors in Winnipeg were trained outside the province. As it happened, medical school did not live up to her expectations. She recalls that her first year was "very boring, sheer memory work." Much to the dean's indignation, she dropped out, transferring to McGill.

Immersing herself in the field of economics, Ostry completed her BA and MA degrees in 1948 and in 1950, respectively. She taught at McGill while finishing her PhD. In 1962, she began teaching at the University of Montreal, leaving two years later when Simon Goldberg, a senior bureaucrat, offered her a high-powered position at Statistics Canada.

By then, Ostry had started a family. She had two boys. One is employed by the International Monetary Fund in Washington and a second is a civil servant in Ottawa.

Ostry rose steadily in the ranks, and in 1972, she was named chief statistician, an appointment which elicited a bevy of vile anti-Semitic letters.

Then she was promoted to deputy minister (consumer and corporate affairs) and deputy registrar-general. "It was one of my favorite jobs," she recalled, saying she helped to reform the Canada Corporation Act and bankruptcy laws.

In 1978, she moved to the Economic Council of Canada, overseeing regulatory reform. Within a year, she accepted an offer from the powerful Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. Since the job she took had always been held by a man, Ostry had to prove herself. "It was a do-or-die situation, but I believe you should be exposed to tough competition."

Returning to Canada in 1984, Ostry was successively deputy minister of international trade, envoy to the multilateral trade negotiations and the prime minister's representative at four Group of 7 summits of industrialized nations.

In 1989, exhausted by the rigorous demands of her globe-trotting duties, she accepted a sabbatical at the Council of Foreign Relations in New York, where she wrote a book. She savored the intellectual freedom and resolved not to go back to government. "I just felt I had done as much as I could."

She is in her element at the Centre for International Studies, but regrets that very little of its funding is Canadian in origin. Ostry, who plans to relinquish her post at the University of Waterloo later this year, keeps abreast of developments in the Middle East.

She shares the vision of former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres that peace and prosperity in the Middle East are interrelated.

Ostry is pleased the centre is doing its bit to disseminate factual information about that perennial hot spot. Last year, it published annotated bibliographies on water supplies and economic cooperation in the Mideast, which scholars and students will doubtless find invaluable.

Family vacation to Flulandia makes you ill

By JORDAN MAX

In the beginning, we planned our long-awaited summer vacation with interesting outings, sports, necessary house repairs, six months' worth of unwatched videotaped sitcoms, hobbies and of course, relaxation time.

Guest Voices

Well, instead we took an unscheduled family vacation together in Flulandia (a nasty viral infection, not a new Russian republic).

Here are some excerpts from my diary (excluding the daily dressing, mealtimes, diaper changes, temper tantrums, sunscreen application, bathtime and bedtime routines).

Day 1: Start vacation early by taking care of children while Nanny has emergency operation. Three-year-old son throws up all over white sofa. Baby daughter taken to doctor, who diagnoses viral pharyngitis. We're off to a great start.

Day 3: Begin packing food, clothing and mountain gear for overnight trip. Refrigerator will not fit on trailer hitch. Travel to Niagara Falls, accompanied by non-stop children's tapes and crying baby daughter. Get lost on walk to Falls. Oldest son starts to develop flu symptoms; taken to local walk-in clinic. Call Tempra manufacturer offering them exclusive official sponsorship of our vacation. Wife and I up half the night with two sick children. Karaoke bar next door provides loud, atonal entertainment until 2 a.m. Rest of Niagara Falls trip cancelled.

Day 5: My annual physical checkup, after two nights of minimal sleep. Blood pressure higher than normal. Make mental note to schedule next year's physical before family vacation. My turn to come down with the flu. Nanny phones to say she's not coming back. Really loud thunderstorm at night. Spend countless hours on kids' beds.

Day 6: Still have the flu. Begin packing up clothes, preparing food for three nights at rented cottage. Enough stuff for a Himalayan expedition. Too sick, even to barbeque. Empty Swiss bank account, buy food for Shabbat meals. House in neighborhood explodes. More nightmares.

Day 10: Cut grass before it looks like wheat field. More packing and food preparation. Finally off to cottage. Unpack, kids discover television only has two channels, neither with children's shows. Sand buckets and sandals missing, presumed left at home. Big, hungry mosquitos. Kept awake until 1 a.m. by loud neighbors' TV. At least it's not Karaoke night.

Day 11: Drive to town to buy buckets, sandals and fruit. Supermarket out of kosher triple chocolate fudge cookies. Spend afternoon at beach building sand casinos and toll roads (castles deemed too passe). Make mistake of allowing children to put sunscreen on my back, resulting in bad sunburn with intricate hand design. Neighbors turn TV down at 12:30 a.m. Progress!

Day 13: More packing and checking for lost toys. Morning paddle boating cancelled due to rain. Drive home through thunderstorm to discover basement washroom flooded. Unpack. Order pizza for dinner while children hug TV. Sprain ankle while teaching sons to play basketball. Spend remainder of day with foot up and iced. Finally beginning to feel like vacation. Make mental note to sprain ankle during vacation.

Day 16: Last day. Find original big List of Things to Do on Vacation; major anxiety attack. Buy materials for house repairs in mistaken belief I will have time to do them. Wife reminds me of promise to schlep furniture from in-laws' house. Get to bed before midnight. Looking forward to going back to work tomorrow at air traffic control for a rest.

Best Books: Readers Choose their Favorites, edited by Chris Murray, Oxford Press $34.95

The Reader's Companion To The Twentieth Century Novel, edited by Peter Parker, Oxford Press $49.95

Where would we be without books? They provide entrance into an unlimited world of knowledge and imagination. Literature can help us to commune with better minds than our own and to lay hold upon better ideas than we now possess. It can give our anti-hero age new figures and personalities to emulate. It can provide a pattern of emotional stability in an uncertain time. It is the best antidote against alienation.

The Spanish Nobel Prize winner, Jorge Luis Borges wrote, "Books are the past memories of the centuries. Consequently, their function is irreplaceable. If books were to disappear, history would disappear."

But what should we read as the books multiply unendingly and as our attention is diverted by the wonders of the technological age?

In Best Books over 100 experts have selected more than 1,500 of their favorite books in five general areas: Aspects of Society, Language and Literature, The Arts, Science and Technology, and History. Each subject has a brief introduction, a pertinent quotation and a list of recommended books — ranging from classics to newly published titles.

The list of Jewish books is chosen by Julia Neuberger, a rabbi who lectures in Bible at Leo Baeck College, London. She suggests the following books, among others:

Jewish Life

What's in a name?

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

What's in a name – or more precisely, a Jewish surname?

No one, it seems, has ever been able to answer that question with as much scientific, linguistic and historical precision as Alexander "Sasha" Beider, a 32-year-old Moscow-born statistician who emigrated to Paris about 1990.

Upon its publication in 1993, Beider's Dictionary of Jewish Surnames From the Russian Empire, which supplies derivations for some 50,000 Jewish surnames, was hailed in genealogical circles as one of the most important books ever printed about Jewish names.

"The first and most important principle I developed for my etymological research is that names must be studied near the places where they originated," Beider explained. "In other words, one should document in what region a name appears for the first time. Geographic distribution is crucial for etymology; it's the basis for all other investigations."

Published in July, Beider's long-awaited companion volume, A Dictionary of Jewish Surnames From The Kingdom of Poland (Avotaynu, US $69.95), adheres rigorously to this geographic principle. The 540-page book contains a listing of some 33,000 Polish-Jewish surnames culled from original archival sources, indicating, if known, where each name occurred at the beginning of the 20th century.

The book's scholarly introduction illuminates many aspects of the hitherto dark process of how Jews acquired their family names. We learn, for instance, that Jews in some Polish provinces were compelled to register their surnames about 1821 and that those who did not comply by 1824 were assigned names that were often less desirable, if not ridiculous. Our ancestors in this period clearly weren't thinking of their genealogically minded descendents, since married sons living in their own homes in Galicia and elsewhere often took names unlike those assumed by their fathers.

Utilizing Russian voters lists for 1906 and 1912, Beider has determined that the 10 most common Jewish names then in use in Russian Poland were Goldberg, Friedmann, Kohn, Rosenberg, Jakubowicz, Lewkowicz, Goldstein, Silberberg, Silberstein and Borenstein. Favored for their associations with wealth, forests, gardens and other pleasant or bounteous images, so-called "artificial" surnames were the most popular category of names and account for 37.5 percent of the total. Examples include Goldberg ("mountain of gold"), Kirszenblat ("leaf of the cherry tree"), Perlmutter ("mother of pearl") and Walfisz or Wallfish ("whale").

Surnames drawn from toponyms or place names – Gluszkin, Kaliszer, Kutner, Lubliner, Nirenberg, Ostrowski, Poznanski, Rudnik, Warszawski – account for 25.2 per cent of the names, while another 15.4 per cent are occupational names such as Arbajter or Arbeiter ("worker"), Kotler ("kettle maker, coppersmith"), Piekarz ("baker"), Portnoj or Portnoy ("tailor"), and Zimmerman or Cymerman ("carpenter").

Other categories include patronymic surnames (Abramson, Jakubowicz, Rubinek), surnames drawn from personal characteristics (Dunkiel, "dark"; Starkman, "strong, thick man"; Szwarcbart, "black beard"), rabbinical surnames (Auerbach, Epsztajn, Horowicz, Jaffe, Margolis, Zaks) and surnames drawn from female given names (Chaneman, Dynowicz, Frejdkin, Glikowski, Raskin, Ryfkin).

A polyglot with some knowledge of eight languages, Beider is able to identify a German spelling change in a surname derived from a Polish noun with a Yiddish suffix. A name with Russian or Ukrainian ending elicits his suggestion that the bearer might have migrated west from the Russian Empire. He also indicates names with Latinate endings (Beatus, Cyncynatus, Jakobi) and names – surprisingly rare – of Hebrew origin, such as Asorodobraj, derived from the phrase for Ten Commandments.

Perusers of the dictionary may be surprised by the uniqueness and variety of the names. Cymbalista, we learn, comes from the Polish for "dulcimer player;" Milgrom or Milgrojm is Yiddish for "pomegranate;" Pasternak is Polish for "parsnip;" Szmek comes from the Yiddish for a "pinch" (of snuff); and so on. Some derivations seem downright peculiar: the author suggests, for example, that the rare name Bratleder originated in the German for "fried liver(?)".

As if compiling two mammoth surname dictionaries in his spare time wasn't taxing enough, Beider issued between their publication a smaller volume on Czech-Jewish surnames from Prague. Asked about the focus of his next project – whether it will be (for example) Romania, Hungary or the Sephardi world – he looks momentarily perplexed. "I haven't yet decided," the usually tireless researcher admits with a sigh. "Right now, I'm taking a break."

Selecting the best books

• A Rabbinic Anthology (1938) edited by C. G. Montefiore and H. Loewe. This is an anthology of writings from the ancient rabbis with a long and helpful introduction.

• Atlas of the Jewish World (1984) by Nicholas de Lange. This is probably the best of the many useful atlases of Jewish history. A book of unending fascination.

• The Jewish People: Their History and Religion (1987) by David J. Goldberg & John D. Rayner. Clear, concise, helpful. A good one-volume treasury of information about Judaism, its history, practices and culture.

• If This is a Man (1960) by Primo Levi. Records what it means to be a Jew, and to experience concentration camps.

Books on the Holocaust are chosen by David Cesarini, professor of Modern Jewish Studies at Manchester University.

• The Racial State — Germany, 1939-1945 (1991) by Michael Burleigh and Wolfgang Wippermann. A superb dissection of Nazi racial policy and practice, revealing how Jews and other minorities were adversely affected by Nazi racial thinking.

• The Holocaust. The Fate of European Jewry (1990) by Leni Yahil. The most comprehensive one-volume account. Rich in detail, yet easy to read.

• Atlas of the Holocaust (1988) by Martin Gilbert. A valuable work of reference that draws on survivor testimony to give a shocking blow-by-blow record of the catastrophe.

• Out of the Whirlwind — A Reader of Holocaust Literature (1976) edited by Albert Friedlander. A collection of stories and extracts from other forms of literature by survivors that takes us as close as possible to the heart of darkness.

These books lead inevitably to others and set readers off on exciting journeys into enjoyment, as well as enhancement of knowledge and spirit.

The Reader's Companion to the Twentieth Century Novel surveys over 750 novels that the editor feels are the most significant titles of the century written in English. The reviews are insightful, long enough to deal closely with both plot and characters and display a broad sympathy of selection.

Jewish readers can refresh their memories, or decide to read for the first time, novels by Saul Bellow, E. L. Doctorow, Jerzy Kosinski, Bernard Malamud, Chaim Potok, Mordecai Richler, Philip Roth, I. B. Singer and others.

Remember, as Mark Twain admonished, "The person who does not read books has no advantage over the person who cannot read them."

You Have a Big Dilemma.

You've just purchased a new vehicle and you don't know what to do with the old one.

You could:

1. Give it to the dealer as a trade-in and get next-to-nothing for it;
2. Try to sell it yourself and deal with countless nudnicks; or
3. Donate it to Bais Yaakov, receive a tax receipt for it's full book value, and on top of that get a BIG mitzvah.

Well, maybe it's not such a big dilemma after all.

Jewish donors get names in stars at the BJC

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – A new energy room, fun centre for children, youth lounge and entertainment centre, and rejuvenated basketball house league are among the achievements so far of the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC), the corporate entity that took over the financially ailing Jewish Community Centre on north Bathurst Street in North York two years ago.

According to BJC president Michael Kerbel, there are also new arts programs, computers and a Hebrew ulpan and Kolel Jewish studies programs there. Last week Kerbel and Sandra Brown, president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, unveiled yet another new item: a donor wall in the BJC's lobby, adorned with Jewish stars inscribed with the names of valued donors.

In a brief ceremony, Kerbel thanked 20 "respected friends of the BJC who have guaranteed our survival by ensuring that our financial needs will be met during our reconstructive period."

He also thanked the "group of seven" sponsors who assisted in the management of the centre during its period of turbulence and reconstruction.

Kerbel thanked three persons by name: Bernie Ghert from Federation; Marty Goldberg, a volunteer and donor; and Deborah Pinsky, the BJC's executive director.

"This event is to let everyone know that we're healthy and happy and thrilled to be here," Pinsky said in an interview, adding that the fundraising drive has brought in $587,000 to date.

'What the BJC is doing is of value'

Among the donors at the reception was Jeff Brown, one of 23 grandchildren and great-grandchildren who collectively made a donation in honor of their grandfather and great-grandfather, Willie Brown, who died last year at age 94.

"He was one of the oldest members here and he was still running two miles whenever he came here," Brown reminisced. "He was the joke-teller of the health club. This is where he hung his hat. I think he felt most at home here, hanging out with his cronies."

Another donor, Sheri Cohen, a social worker who works with children and adults with learning disabilities, said she became a supporter of the BJC after learning of its programs involving disabled children.

"What the BJC is doing is really of value," she said. "It's very important that kids with learning disabilities be integrated into the community."

The BJC's donor wall has about 125 stars, only about half of which are inscribed; the others are blank. Fundraising efforts continue.

At the unveiling of the BJC Donor Wall is Sandy Brown and Michael Kerbel.

CJC says use of French in no danger in Quebec

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — No further measures are needed to bring about a "change of attitude" in Quebec over the importance of French, Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region argued in its recent brief to Quebec's Commission de la culture, which got underway Aug. 28.

Unlike B'nai Brith, whose brief delivered a strongly-worded, explicit indictment of Bill 40, which would resurrect the Commission de la protection de la langue francaise — derided in the anglophone community as the "language police" — Congress opted to address the hearing's other terms of reference: overall language policy based on a government paper setting forth a series of policy principles.

In Congress's opinion, the Parti Quebecois government's attitude is "problematic" since it assumes a threat to French in the province.

This despite all evidence to the contrary, the brief says, including the vast majority of Quebecers — 94 percent — who use French in their daily lives.

Moreover, the brief says "until just recently," Quebec was enjoying a state of "linguistic equilibrium and a climate of acceptable compromise for the the majority of Quebecers."

A positive social climate and Quebecers' support for affirming the province's French face will not be served by changing language policies, the brief suggests.

Congress reiterated its support for the "preservation and promotion of the French language," but any measure taken to reinforce those goals, the brief stresses, "must, absolutely and without exception, be compatible with the principles and spirit of the Canadian and Quebec charters on rights and individual freedoms."

The brief also points to what is sees as a disparity between the vehement language of the government's "consultation" on language and its actual, "relatively moderate" recommendations that would, nonetheless, still have a "more or less great impact."

The strong language, Congress says, seems to reveal a "narrow vision" of Quebec society.

Congress sees having legislators define the parameters of making French "the common language of public life" as "highly problematic."

By doing so, "this goal potentially becomes the source of a long and stormy debate on individual rights and freedoms."

As well, the messages are contradictory, the brief states, because the government paper also speaks of the "rich" contribution of other languages to Quebec society.

The brief also regrets use of the terms "Quebecois" and "Quebecoises" as referring only to francophones, suggesting it and other factors might serve to add to a climate of confrontation.

The document makes constant reference to the need for linguistic consensus but says "certain contradictions exist between the means and the end," and that "the greatest threat to linguistic consensus is the political proposal submitted to the consulation."

The brief also takes issue with proposals on immigration and to increase the proportion of francophones on Montreal island.

First, it argues, a proposal to bring in more immigrants "more readily disposed to" Quebec life by knowing French is already policy.

Second, recent policy has been to reduce the total number of independent immigrants allowed into the province, not increase it.

Instead, Congress suggests, why not "seek ways to improve Quebec's ability to take in immigrants so as to be able to raise the immigration level?"

The brief also challenges the need to increase the francophone population of Montreal, because, it argued, the need is based on misleading statistics which exclude off-island areas where large pockets of francophones live, such as Longueuil, while including areas on the West Island, like Dollard des Ormeaux, with its high anglophone and allophone populations.

TORONTO LOVES THE LAUNCH

It was an invigorating mixture of sentiment, pride and hope for the future with a little added pizzaz. Al Waxman, the evening's guest speaker, called it "oneness." Whatever it was it was felt by everyone of the more than 1,000 who attended the 1997 UJA Federation Community Campaign Launch last week.

"I really feel I'm part of something very special tonight," said Michael Budman, who co-chaired the launch with his partner Don Green and Debbie Kimel. "I'm proud to belong to an organization that epitomizes the core of Jewish values. "It's been a magical evening," added Green, "one people will remember for a long time."

Green and Budman, co-founders of Roots Canada, loaned UJA Federation the Roots logo for the evening's "remembering our roots" theme, with printed T-shirts, posters and key chains. All the proceeds from t-shirt sales will go to UJA Federation.

Debbie Kimel said it was "a thrill to work on the launch and very exciting to see such an overwhelming turnout."

Campaign Chairman David Goldstein thanked everyone for "stepping forward when the community called," and said he was "proud to represent the community in 1997."

"It's the hottest ticket in town," noted Michael Daren, vice-chairman of the 1997 campaign with David Engel. "The fact that so many past UJA Federation chairmen are here tonight speaks of the loyalty this campaign has created," added Engel.

The evening also featured musical performances by both Shorashim and community choirs and a UJA Federation multi-media presentation.

UJA Federation launch receives enthusiastic reviews

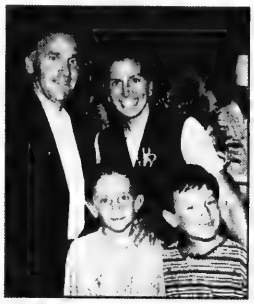
Some launch participants were so moved by the evening, they had trouble finding words to describe their emotions. Here's what they had to say.

Shana Harris, Principal of Bialik Hebrew Day School, said "the evening captured what UJA Federation does in a very entertaining yet powerful way."

Gary Grundman, co-chair of Major Gifts, said "it's great to see so many members of the community come out in support of the campaign."

Michael Bregman, one of the evenings honourary chairmen, felt "a great sense of energy from the gathering."

According to Beth Tzedec's Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl "the success of the launch says a great deal about the future of the community."



Gary, Bonnie, Michael and Jamie Grundman.

David Barkin predicted "this year will be the year of opportunity and a community-building year."

UJA Federation Vice-Chairman David Engel summed it up: "tonight the community feels like one big family."

"The entire evening made me get in touch with myself and my own feelings about my Jewish identity and being part of this community," said Barbara Sigler.

Alan Winer, co-chair of canvasser training, thought the launch was "a great motivational evening and the perfect way to start the campaign."

United Israel Appeal President Harvey Wolfe applauded Toronto's Jewish community "for always making sure no Jew is alone."

Harvey Wolfe

Rochelle and David Barkin

Women's Campaign Chair Vicki Campbell said "it was a very emotional evening. Al Waxman and Shai Kaminsky's presentations served as eloquent inspiration for this year's campaign."

Song and dance deliver the message

Call out. Reach out and take the message home. These were among the many emotional lyrics sung by six young Israelis, at the 1997 UJA Federation Community Campaign Launch.

Allan Pakes

The group, whose name Shorashim echoed the evening's "remembering your roots" theme, offered participants their musical views on the meaning of being Jewish. Four members of the group made aliya to pursue their entertainment careers.

Shai Kaminsky, who left Kiev with the help of the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency, says "Toronto is great but there's no place like home."

Allan Pakes, former Director of Communications at the Jewish Agency in Jerusalem, formed Shorashim to perform at the 1996 UJA Young Leadership Conference in Washington last May. "The national UJA asked me to create a program that would deliver a message about the work done by UJA Federations," explains Pakes. "I believe there is no better medium for this type of message than song, video and stage performance," he adds.

Other highlights of the program included performances by the Bathurst Jewish Centre Children's Choir and the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living Seniors' Choir, and a keynote address by actor Al Waxman and a UJA Federation multi-media presentation featuring the campaign video "Keep the Fire Burning...Chapter Two."

READY FOR WORK

UJA Federation, Jewish Family & Child Service and Jewish Vocational Service are asking the community to offer job opportunities for its unemployed members.

The joint venture pilot project, which began last June, was created to help welfare recipients and the unemployed find work in an increasingly competitive environment. JF&CS social workers selected 30 of their most eligible clients and referred them to JVS where they were assessed based on experience, training and skills.

"We want to help these people become more independent and less reliant on the community for financial support," explains Fran Giddens, JVS project co-ordinator. "The highest form of tzedakah," adds Giddens, "is helping people help themselves."

Thirteen employment candidates were chosen from the group and now UJA Federation is calling on the community to provide whatever opportunities are available. Candidates are available for interviews.

Successful summer at Leo Baeck Centre

Jerusalem- Young immigrants from the former Soviet Union and their Arab peers from Haifa. Seven hundred Ethiopian youths from the Neve Carmel caravan absorption site. Children from homes torn apart by drug abuse and toddlers in an early childhood education program. These are just some of the over 1,500 Israeli youths who took part in outreach day camps this summer at Israel's only Reform-affiliated matnas, the Israeli equivalent of a Jewish community centre.

Located on the sprawling green campus of the Leo Baeck Education Centre in Haifa, the matnas includes the Lehrman Community Centre, the Ohel Avraham Reform synagogue, led by Michael Marmur, son of Toronto Rabbi Dov Marmur and the Offman Sports Centre, a United Israel Appeal of Canada project.

The campus and its many facilities are filled with the secular and the religious, Ashkenazim and Sephardim, new immigrants and sabras, mainstream and disadvantaged Israelis, Arabs and Jews. As part of the philosophy of what began in 1938 as a small kindergarten, Leo Baeck has always been committed to the promotion and practice of tolerance, pluralism, and respect in the tradition of the school's namesake, Rabbi Leo Baeck, a philosopher and teacher of the Reform movement in Germany.

Most of the summer camp activities were based at the Offman Sports Centre, a state-of-the-art sports complex where youngsters happily took advantage of its two swimming pools, full-sized sports hall, complete Nautilus room, sauna and jacuzzi, and an all-purpose outdoor field for handball, soccer, basketball and tennis.

The centre, built in 1991, is named for Allan Offman, past UJA Federation Campaign Chairman and a prominent leader in the Toronto Jewish community.

During the year, the complex is used by its 2,000 family membership for the schools' physicial education classes and other activities.

Histadrut closes Winnipeg office

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG – At the urging of longtime executive director Noach Witman, the Winnipeg Histadrut office has been closed as of the end of August.

The annual campaign will be run out of Montreal.

"I have been asking to be relieved of this position for the last two years," says Witman, who is 92. "I am getting older and find fundraising harder to do. At the same time, I have been doing this job on a volunteer basis for the last 15 years. I don't feel it it right to hire someone to be the executive director here."

Witman, western Canada's leading Yiddishist, has been associated with Histadrut ever since he came to Canada and Winnipeg in 1927. He opened the office in 1942 and used to crisscross western Canada to raise money on behalf of the organization.

"We used to raise $80,000 a year in Winnipeg and another $100,000 from the other smaller Jewish communities in the west," he recalls.

He resigned in 1956 because he had tired of being a one-man operation outside of Winnipeg. He had also taken over the editorship of the Yiddish-language Israelite Press. He severed his connections with the Histadrut for a few years when the organization split off from Pioneer Women (Na'amat), a move he opposed. He rejoined when the two groups were reunited.

In recent years, he reports, the Winnipeg campaign has averaged about $37,000.

"I advised the head office to run the campaign out of Montreal rather than hire an executive director for here," he says. "I have sent them the lists and the cards. The campaign will run Oct. 15 as usual. I will make appeals in my weekly newspaper column and radio show."

Although he has left the Histadrut, Witman is conceding little else to old age. He will continue to write his Yiddish column in The Jewish Post and News and host his weekly Yiddish language radio show.

He also has a monthly public access cable television show and continues to serve as executive secretary for Winnipeg's Committee for Yiddish and as cultural chair for the Yiddish-language H. Leivick B'nai Brith Lodge.

Winnipeg teen enters essay contest finals

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG – Anna Tennenhouse, 17, was one of only six finalists in the senior grade category, from over 1,000 entries submitted to the fifth annual Morris J. and Betty Kaplun Essay Contest last fall.

The contest was established by trustees of the Morris J. and Betty Kaplun Foundation (the Kapluns were refugees from Nazi Germany) to encourage young people to think about what it means to be Jewish.

"I was interested in the topic (What is the Secret of the Jewish People's Immortality?)," says Tennenhouse, a student at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate. "I have always kept a journal, but the only other writing contest I have ever entered was my school's Fern Shawna Rykiss Writing Award," named in memory of a former student who was killed in a terrorist incident in Israel a few years ago. Tennenhouse won the award in Grade 10.

While pleased to receive a cheque for $18 (US) for submitting her entry early (one of the first 50 contestants to enter), Tennenhouse says she forgot about the contest as she was caught up in the year's activities. She received $750 for being a finalist.

The Kaplun Award caps an outstanding year for the honors student who is starting Grade 12. In addition to the award, she was chosen to be a page at the provincial Legislature and to attend a mock parliament in Ottawa in March for young Canadians.

In April, she participated in the March of the Living and while she was away, a song she wrote took first prize in the annual Joseph Wolinksy Collegiate Israel Song Festival, the fourth year in a row that her song has won first prize.

"I am not a songwriter," she says. "I just write songs for the song festival."

Her songwriting ability is enhanced by 12 years of violin lessons and her participation as a singer in Winnipeg's Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble.

For this year, Tennenhouse says she plans to take things a little easier. She will concentrate on her school work while looking forward to going to Israel with her classmates in the spring. (The annual Israel trip at the end of Grade 12 is a JWC tradition.)

As to her future, she has not yet decided on a career. "I am keeping my options open," she says.

Atlantic Canada JNF to honor Pinks

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritime Correspondent

HALIFAX — The Jewish community here has named Irving and Ruth Pink of Yarmouth as the honorees at the 1996 JNF of Atlantic Canada Negev Dinner.

The couple has given years of devotion to their community, to Canada and to Israel.

The gala dinner will be held Sept. 8 at the Beth Israel Synagogue social hall in Halifax. Noted Canadian comedian Dave Broadfoot will be guest speaker.

But the spotlight will be on the Pinks, stalwarts of the Yarmouth Jewish community for more than 60 years and longtime benefactors of the secular community.

Irving Pink, 83, still practises law. He was recently honored by the Nova Scotia Barrister's Society for 60 years of service.

"I'd love to quit, but I've nothing else to do," he says with a laugh.

He has worked hard for United Israel Appeal, Jewish National Fund and Israel Bond campaigns and has been a community pillar from the days when 30 to 40 families made the Yarmouth congregation a vibrant force, until today, when only a handful of families remain in the community.

"We still have a synagogue, but only bring a rabbi in for the High Holidays," he says. "Our building is owned by Shaar Shalom in Halifax [the Yarmouth congregation was Orthodox until it became necessary to court women in its minyanim and Conservatism was adopted] so there will be some continuity."

Ruth Pink became a member of Hadassah in 1948 and ultimately became regional chair, national vice-chair and national vice-president. She has worked to keep Yarmouth Hadassah together, with only five members.

"Four years ago, we created a foundation and contacted every past member and their children," she recalls. "The contribution made by 14 or 15 people let us unveil a plaque in Israel to perpetuate Daughters of Zion, the Yarmouth chapter.

In the secular community, Irving chaired the Yarmouth Regional Hospital board for 25 years, was president of the Yarmouth Liberal Association, was one of only two non-elected citizens ever to be elected president of the Nova Scotia Union of Municipalities and president of the Nova Scotia Education Association.

Ruth has been a member of the YMCA board, chairing a financial campaign for a new building in 1981. She was instrumental in publishing the Bluenose Cookbook which has now had four editions in seven printings. The couple co-chaired a hospital camapaign for $8 million.

Ruth's gardening prowess was featured in Chatelaine magazine in 1991 and her pottery creations are sold throughout Nova Scotia.

"We didn't have to have the recognition," says Ruth. "Anything we do is because we enjoy doing it."

"It really does us more good than the people we might be helping. It keeps us alive and going," Irving adds.

They have passed on their community enthusiasm to four sons — Steven, Joel, Darrel and Ronald, all living in Halifax and all involved in charitable work. Steven is a businessman, while the others are lawyers, like their father.

Tickets for the Negev Dinner, at $54 each, are available through the Atlantic Jewish Council in Halifax.

Joint house of worship set to open

WATERLOO — The official opening of Canada's first-ever joint house of worship will take place Sept. 5 at 7:30 p.m. when The Cedars Worship and Community Centre opens its doors at 543 Beechwood Dr., Waterloo.

The Cedars will be shared between Westminster United Church and Temple Shalom — the first jointly designed and constructed split worship facility in Canada.

The $1.4 million building is owned by Westminister United Church. Temple Shalom, a Reform congregation, will hold a five-year lease, with an option to purchase half The Cedars.

Two adjoining sanctuaries will house 300 seats for the church and 84 for the synagogue. Each sanctuary can expand as the need arises.

For information on the opening, call Temple Shalom president Robert Chodos at 519-662-3390.

What's New for Fall

This year makeup colors for fall will dazzle with feminine sensuality. Shades are as vivid as purple or as sensuous as naked flesh. Color your eyes with black eyeliner edged with white, or simply choose monochromatic shades to sizzle with your mood. Whatever your fancy, make a statement, fall '96 is bold and right on the edge.

After the long hot summer treat yourself to a professional facial or an at home facial scrub and purifying mask. Which ever your choice, its imperative to lift out impurities that may have settled in your pores.

Depending on your skin type choose a hydrating and revitalizing mask to combat the lack of humidity and drying effects of heating vents. Keeping your skin subtle and radiant is worth the time and effort. Your skin is like an artist's canvas.

Before setting out to purchase your new fall collection organize your makeup at home. Often, you may only need a new lip gloss or lip pencil to change the whole effect of lipsticks you already own. Blending colors together can also create a fresh new look.

Carol's Tips:

SKIN CARE — is essential during the fall season. Cold, chilling winds can cause your skin to dry and feel tight. Notice the changes your skin experiences from season to season. It is not unusual to be oily in the summer and dry in the fall. Exfoliate, cleanse, tone, moisturize and treat are all necessary steps to keep your complexion soft and clear.

LANCOME treats us with an irresistible duo — Souplesse is an intensive hydration bath that leaves your skin feeling velvety and supple. Viveclat, a revitalizing mask, activates cell metabolism and invigorates the skin. Regular use will help make your skin firmer and more radiant. Also from LANCOME is a three-in-one cleansing product. In just seconds, your face and eyes are cleansed and toned. The name, Eau De Bienfait.

Skin Illuminating Complex by ELIZABETH ARDEN is a new night cream that incorporates retinyl technology resulting in improved skin clarity, radiance and texture.

FOUNDATION — will provide the perfect base for your makeup application. It will protect your skin from the environment and in many cases help to nourish it. Contrary to common belief it almost never causes blemishes. Make your skin appear flawless by applying a sheer layer to your whole face, blend well and dust with translucent powder.

Teint Caresse Natural (Natural Perfection Makeup) from CHANEL is lightly textured and smooth as silk. It eliminates all imperfections yet feels weightless and looks totally natural.

LANCOME introduces Maquisuperbe, a shimmering liquid that adds a sheer, subtle glow all over — face, cheeks and shoulders — the sheen of youth.

Sweep color lightly

BLUSH — your cheeks with soft hues. Sweep color lightly on the highest point of your cheek bone. Be sure to use a large, soft brush or sponge to create a natural healthy glow.

LANCOME's Blush Subtil is a delicate oil free powder blush-perfect for oily skin. Its fine texture allows for easy application.

Mocha blush by CHANEL, will add the perfect hint of color to your new fall makeup.

Beyond Blusher by CLINIQUE is a two-in-one delight. It has a soft sponge applicator for your cheeks and lips. Either way you are blushed. It is ideal for young teens or the lady on the go.

EYES — Hot news — eyeliner is available in every shape, size and color imaginable. It's a must with all your eye looks. Harmony blends, or direct contrasts, will set your eyes in motion. For an eye-opening effect, curl your lashes, dust with powder and apply lots of rich creamy mascara.

CHRISTIAN DIOR's Diorliner is designed for use by even the most inexperienced. Its finely-styled applicator allows for precision application. For extra drama, blend DIOR's black eye shadow deep in the crease of your eye.

Create your eyestyle with one little compact from LANCOME. Available in seven perfectly coordinated color stories each containing two shadows and one eyeliner cake to be applied wet or dry. For the tearful group try LANCOME's Le Stylo Waterproof, an eyeliner pencil that tows the line with long wearing diligence.

L'OREAL's Sensitique Mascara features the same pH balance as human tears. This breakthrough formula offers full luxurious lashes and promises to be irritant free.

For an especially sensational look dress your lashes with Rouge Noir mascara from CHANEL.

LIPS — will be bold, full and sexy. Define your lips, but don't make them look unnatural. Enlarging you lips too much can make them look like they belong to a marionette. Choose a lipstick shade that enhances your skin tone and for extra shine and shimmer top it off with gloss.

CHANEL's Precision Lip Definer in Rouge Noir will create boldness and significant definition. Apply Quantuor Levres Intenses (Lip Intensities) for a rich and sensuous effect. Also from CHANEL this season are spectacular nail enamels in colors such as Metal Bronze and Metal Garnet.

Slick on LANCOME's 14K glint of golden gloss to shimmer and update colors you already own. Rouge Idole is LANCOME's Indelibly Divine Lip Color that plays for keeps. Its hold power hugs your lips until you take it off.

FRAGRANCE — can be a deliciously pleasurable experience, or simply, your worst nightmare. Your choice of fragrance speaks volumes. When choosing a scent experiment first and see what works best with your body chemistry. Your friend's scent may smell completely different on you.

PACO RABANNE — one scent says it all. This unisex fragrance is provocative and energetic. Its aluminum cylinder packaging is recyclable and in one word — exquisite.

BVLGARI is a fragrance created by the world famous Italian jewellers. This fresh green tea fragrance was designed for men and women. It combines Oriental subtlety with Mediterranean warmth through its base note of green tea, mid note of jasmine and top note of Spanish orange blossom. For added pleasure try a Tea Bag bath. Simply hang a Bvlgari tea bag on your water faucet and let the hot water stream through.

DOLCE VITA, by Christian Dior, is a soft melody of romance and sensuality. It is floral, fruity and woody all at once. This mood enhancing scent translates quite literally to — "Sweet Life."

Carol Birken Wise is a beauty and fashion expert. She will be conducting seminar at the LEARNING ANNEX (964-0011) throughout the fall and winter season.

In any aerobics class there's a spandex dress code

By SHERYL HALPERN
Special to The CJN

This summer you saw what you looked like in bathing suits and tennis outfits. This fall you are definitely going back to the gym. But walk in during any aerobics class and it's clear: there's a spandex dress code.

If you're a beginner, you can, if you want, ignore the code. You can wear over-sized T-shirts (not so oversized that they look like nightshirts or interfere with leg movements.) You can get away with T-shirts with logos, polo shirts, jogging suits, sweat pants or baggy shorts. Or you can go half-way, with your extra-extra-large T-shirts over form-fitting short shorts, Lycra bike pants or tights.

But if you want to look like a serious exercise buff, watch the regulars, and go for the cropped-and-layered look. Pop a crop top, tank or T-back sport bra (an easy-wear bandeau, not lingerie) over bike pants; layer a leotard or shorts over below-knee tights; top a unitard with bike-pant legs with a cropped T-shirt or a mesh shirt.

Check out the latest workout gear at department and specialty stores — names like Nike, Adidas, Body Glove, Reebok, Danskin, Brooks, Everlast are good bets. What you buy depends on your budget and your figure (your instructor wears a crop top, and a thong over her tights — wear this combo only if you look like your instructor.)

Here's what you'll find:

Fabrics: Lycra-spandex and nylon add the bounce-back stretch you need for heavy workouts; cotton adds comfort and breathability. Look for cotton-spandex blends, and check the washing instructions to make sure you get machine-wash-and-dry wear. If you're exercising three or four times a week, you shouldn't have to hand-wash and line-dry your gear each time.

Colors: Black and gym-grey rule — especially in tanks, sports bras and crop tops, short shorts and bike shorts. Unitards can be two-tone — one by Adidas is navy with wide grey side inserts. But you can go for bright colors, even geometric prints, in leotards (spotted: geometrics on a sunny gold background and a blue and purple basketweave) and below-knee tights (glowing in neon-bright pink, yellow, lime, and in turquoise, purple, navy and a mauve-blue abstract design.)

Styles: If you've got it, flaunt it: T-back sport bras and cap-sleeve crop tops for women, tanks for men, leotards cut high on the hip show off figures, and yes, allow a fuller range of movement. So do skin-tight bike pants and tights, the very sleek not-for-Olympians-only unitards (with halter or maillot straps) and the wear-if-you-dare thongs. Yes, it does look a lot like beachwear — the leotards look like maillots, the sport bras like 2-piecer tops, the short shorts like beach trunks. But here they're built rugged enough for reps.

If you're not ready to flaunt it, ease into the look with looser cap-sleeve or polo tops, cap-sleeve leotards and shorts over tights. Soon you'll be in style and in shape. Just do it, as the ads say. Remember: you do have to look at yourself in the gym mirrors. And so do the regulars.

Jo-Anne has the right answer

By SIDURA LUDWIG
CJN Staff

TORONTO – Jo-Anne Walter has always liked clothes. And she's always wanted to own her own business.

The 30-year-old entrepeneur is now the owner of The Answer Salon, a women's clothing store for plus sizes.

"Plus sizes is a market that needs to be served," Walter said in a recent interview.

Located at 3200 Yonge St. (Yonge/Lawrence area), the boutique-style store carries everything from bathing suits to business suits.

"I try to give my customers a full range of clothing," Walter said, "so that they don't have to go shop anywhere else."

Walter sells higher end clothing, to present her customers with the best selection of quality. She buys her clothes from Toronto, Montreal and New York. Having recently attended a plus size show in Las Vegas, she is now carrying some California lines.

She emphasizes that her number 1 priority is her customers.

"I won't sell my customers clothing that doesn't look good on them. I want them to feel comfortable here and trust our opinion. I want them to walk out of here and have people say, 'I love your clothes! Where did you get them?'"

Jo-Anne Walter

Originally from Montreal, Walter moved to Toronto seven years ago to do her MBA at York University. Through that program, she was able to participate in an internship in Paris, France for six months. There, she tried her hand at international business, but spent her free time window shopping and admiring the fashions.

After completing her degree, Walter worked for Imperial Oil as a systems analyst for 2½ years.

Then two years ago, she spotted an ad in the Financial Post requesting a buyer for The Answer Salon.

"I checked out the financial statements and then spent some time in the store."

She hasn't looked back since. Walter continues to expand the store by appealing to younger customers, while maintaining relationships with her regulars.

"I have a staff of six part-timers," she said, "most of whom have been here since before I bought the store. They know the clientele. People come in and ask for a specific staff person."

Walter's family has been in the clothing business for generations. After her grandfather died, her grandmother opened up a clothing store in Montreal to support herself.

"When I was younger, I didn't work in the store, but I went buying a lot," Walter recalled.

Walter's mother, as well, owns a women's clothing store in Montreal called Boutique Bessie. Walter doesn't dismiss the possibility of expanding her business with her mother at some point in time.

"We call each other all the time with new ideas."

Even before owning her own store, Walter was a participant with United Jewish Appeal's (UJA) Young Business Network for young Jewish entrepreneurs.

"We would bring in different speakers from the business world. It was an opportunity to expand our knowledge of business in the Jewish community and to make contacts."

Walter spent part of last summer touring Israel with the UJA-sponsored trip, Yachdav. She said she would consider bringing in lines of Israeli clothing for her business, particularly bathing suits.

Although she's always looking for ways to expand her business, Walter wants to take things one step at a time.

Naukoff Kosmetics gets in your face

By CAROL BIRKEN-WISE
Special to The CJN

Fashion and cosmetic designers have been doing it for years, overtly, covertly or simply subconsciously. Copying ideas is somewhat commonplace in the playground of beauty and fashion.

However, the mode of this new cosmetic company is unmistakably in your face, its name — Naukoff Kosmetix. Not only do they knock-off cosmetics, it seems they knock-down the price.

Company president Nancy Crossley set out to develop a line of cosmetics that would offer the public a high quality product, at a reasonable price. Naukoff Kosmetix and their team of makeup artists have been providing makeup services to on-air celebrities for over 10 years.

Ofra Harnoy

Some of their clients have included Brad Pitt, Robert Redford, Joan Rivers and Shirley Maclean. Celebrities like Ofra Harnoy, Camilla Scott and Monica Deol say they never leave home without it.

Naukoff Kosmetix is also involved in various television specials such as the Genie Awards, Gemini Awards and CTV's Sick Kids Telethon, as well as regular shows for the Life Network, CFTO, Channel 47 and Discovery.

Crossley keeps a close eye on quality. Consistency, color and staying power are her foremost concerns. The eyeshadows are triple-milled making them smooth as silk. Lipsticks contain sunscreen, Vitamin E and a high percentage of pigment to increase the staying power. All ingredients have been tested for allergic reactions and contain minimal fragrance. They are registered and approved by the FDA of Canada and ensure they are cruelty-free.

These hot new cosmetics embody the very best qualities of the prominent high priced lines which Crossley has favored over the years. The sensational color story is extensive and the names are adorably FUN-etix. Eyeshadow colors like Bored-Oh, Cash-shoe and Durt say it all.

Naukoff Kosmetix is high quality, affordably priced and will definitely put a smile on your face. It will be available September 96 at Boutique locations throughout Canada, on the Internet and on the Shopping Channel in October. For further information call — 416-409-9602.

Kids want to be cool with hippest brand names

By ANITA SZABADI GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

Kids' T-shirts, with slogans such as "Flower Power" or "Peace" used to be a sign of the times. Then, designer names such as Pierre Cardin or Oscar de la Renta were identified discreetly on a lapel or pocket flap.

Today, kids don T-shirts and sweatshirts that display brand names, sports figures and slogans, all reflecting our way of life today. Nike is shown in 6 inch high letters, Reebok is spread diagonally over the front and back of a sweatshirt and Tommy Hilfiger is printed in multi-colored letters wherever it will fit. Reading anecdotal slogans has become a pastime as my 12-year-old's friends parade through our kitchen: Baseball is life — it's not the bats, it's the balls; It's just a game — yeah right!; Second place is the first loser; Hockey is life, the rest is just details.

Sportswear manufacturers are not left out in the cold with Reebok's Above the Rim line and the college varsity and professional sports teams. Recently, when I asked my son's friend if he was a Charlotte Hornets fan because of the hat he was sporting, he was surprised at my question and said simply, "I'm not a fan — the hat is just cool!"

Then there are the brand names such as Stussy, No Fear, Mossimo and No rules. These new 'designer' names are found on everything from sports bags to dress shirts. A pair of Exhaust jeans has just become part of my son's collection. Another popular brand is Guess? carrying a whole collection of sportswear including shoes and socks to match.

I have to say, however, that more often than not the quality of these items is high. — Attention is paid to using top quality fabrics, such as heavy weight 100 percent pre-shrunk cotton, or easy care cotton polyester blends with some spandex thrown in to ensure the clothes keep their shape. Lots of detail work is added with double stitching, interesting pockets, side-flaps and buttons.

The irony of this name-crazy trend for teens and betweens is that they think they have created an individual style all their own. But all in all, this trend adds up to a satisfied teenager (could I ask for anything more!), a thankful mom-consumer and an eager little brother waiting in the wings for top quality and very cool hand-me-downs.

The pros and cons of wearing school uniforms

BY ANITA SZABADI GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

Call a parents' meeting about an educational issue and the attendance will be respectable. Schedule a meeting to discuss a school uniform policy however, and there will be a full house. Everyone's talking about the pros and cons of uniforms.

Uniforms were almost always a given in both public and private schools in the '40s and '50s but with the arrival of the free-spirited '60s and early '70s, uniforms were relegated to posh private schools only. The thinking of the times said that children should be allowed to express their individuality. What better form of expression than the way you dress, to show the world who you were and what you stood for.

Over the past five to eight years, however, uniforms for both public and private school have made a comeback and many elementary and high schools have adopted a uniform policy for their students.

Debbie Feldstein, owner of Les Veterans A Plus, a Ville St-Laurent uniform manufacturer, began her business in 1990 because she saw this growing market for uniforms. "Parents and students alike were looking to create a sense of pride in their school and themselves," says Feldstein. "A standard uniform or color code would create this for them.

"Often parents are resistant to uniforms at first," says Feldstein, "but when they realize the benefits, they are convinced."

Among the many benefits are that when buying uniforms, the initial outlay may seem costly, but minimal additional clothing is needed to get through the school year. Also, a good quality uniform can be passed down from "generation to generation" says Feldstein.

The classic tunic, box pleat or V-neck, is most often chosen for girls while boys choose pants and a collared shirt. A cardigan with the school crest is almost always included to complete the uniforms's look.

Another benefit of uniforms is that competition between children is kept to a minimum and there is no difference created between those that can afford designer clothes and those who wear hand-me-downs.

Comfort is also the key, with careful attention paid to using quality fabrics and incorporating a lot of fleece coordinates. "When designing our line of uniforms, we have to think about both the parents and children," says Feldstein, "Parents look for quality and kids look for comfort." Kids also look for style, so Feldstein has designed a line in which "classical meets trendy" and school administrators, parents and students seem satisfied.

Public schools often have a difficult task when trying to institute a uniform policy because being part of a city-wide or regional school board, they cannot mandate a uniform. A color-code is a feasible alternative and parents are asked to voluntarily abide by it. "Color codes for public schools are extremely popular and their numbers continue to grow," says Feldstein.

Feldstein works with public and private school representatives to create an individual look for their school. Colors, styles and fabrics are chosen to reflect each school. "The most popular colors chosen for elementary schools today are navy and white with a third color accent such as red, gold or kelly green," says Feldstein. "And gray and burgundy solids or plaids are the preferred high schools colors." If a school already has its own colors from sports teams or clubs, these colors will often be included.

"Of course, the name of a school lends itself to the creation of a color code as in the case of Greendale School in Dollard des Ormeaux where all elements of their coordinates always incorporate green," says Feldstein. Many schools also use a crest, most often added onto the cardigan, blazer and/or gym uniform. If the school does not already have a crest, Feldstein and her team will work with the school committees to create one.

Ease of implementation of a new school uniform or color-code policy is also key to the program's success. Companies such as Veterans A Plus and others will bring fashion shows to school auditoriums, arrange fitting sessions in school gyms or have well-appointed show rooms where parents and children can go and feel comfortable as they make their final choices. Feldstein also takes over the function of supplying letters and catalogues to parents, order form distribution and collection and final delivery of complete uniform packages.

The classic box-pleat or V-neck tunic still serves as a basic element for most school uniforms. (Photo: Vetements A Plus)

Comfort comes first as many school uniforms and color codes feature a full line of fleece coordinates. (Photo: Vetements A Plus)

Robin Kay fall line founded along 'green principles'

Robin Kay isn't neutral about the colour green. As an environmentalist and fashion designer, she has created a fashion empire founded on "green" environmental principles.

So naturally, when Toronto-based designer Robin Kay took her Fall collection to the McGill Club earlier this year to show in front of gathered guests it was to spread the word on the joys of environmental clothing,

On view on the runway, a selection of clothes of woven hemp fabric, and an array of Robin Kay cotton knitwear and home wears of natural unbleached cotton.

With seasoned skill, Robin Kay uses unbleached cotton knit as the basis of her collection. Seasonal colours - this fall a rich dark brown and spinach, pop in and out, but "natural" is a constant. Apart from color, Robin Kay is proving that environmentally-conscious clothing need not be crunchy.

The runaway display of stove pipe leggings, long, ribbed, body hugging turtlenecks, and a range of layered looks, all slick and fashionably sleek, proved that if the content is pure, so is the style.

Robin Kay is available at Robin Kay Home and Style stores in Canada. This Fall Robin Kay Pure Body Ecology and Homeline will be available in selected Holt Renfrew stores across Canada.

FOR ALL WALKS OF LIFE

Sterling Heather Wool Crepe is the foundation for this sophisticated sportswear group. The silhouettes here are very new and exciting with several new jacket shapes. Jones New York has used a lightweight sub-base that creates a sophisticated new suit.

Texture is a special element in this group. Jones New York likes to see the base cloth worn with the yarn dye novelties. The play of texture and fabric will show how softness can be achieved while also emphasizing sophistication. Look for elegant jacquards and luxe fabrics to attain the refined allure.

Prints are sublte and multi-textural, giving them an antique textile look. Sweaters incorporate bouclé yarns and some subtle gunmetal lurex touches for highlight.

The use of a sweater in place of a blouse for a suit emphasizes a European quality Jones New York sees as the the total attitude of the group.

Fall Fashion

Two faux furs – zebra print plus pure black for the crown, with black angora gloves braceleted with matching zebra.

Heaslip's headlines Fall'96

The Heaslip Line offering quality and beauty in headwear is becoming a "buy word" within the vast North American market. And there are reasons:

Under the 10 year leadership of Bob and Elaine Siegel, Heaslip has introduced designer driven lines in a wide variety of leathers, fabrics and new technical products. And,of course, they have maintained and further developed the Heaslip knits cherished by generations of Canadian women.

Heaslip's stylish offerings for each and every season can be found in Canada in such distinguished department stores as Eaton's and Holt Renfrew and chains like L'Hiver en Folie and Bizou and other boutiques.

Warm Up

The beautifully hatted quartet of photos you see here gives just a hint of Heaslip's fabulous offerings.

•The big picture – a show hat supreme that combines plush suede with a generous banding of Italian metallic lamb.

•To make winter truly a wonderland – indoors as well as out – a glorious après ski ensemble; toque, vest and mittens in winter white cotton tapestry and faux fur.

•The ideal couple – the hat itself of two faux furs, in zebra print for the rolled brim and pure black for the crown. The graceful accompanying gloves, in black angora braceleted with matching zebra.

•The hat (almost) all seasons – from afar, a casual "Bloomsbury" knit cloche. Up close, the deep artfully swirled band of soft suede, repeated by the trim edging its brim, moves this hat from casual to classic.

Liz Harbosin is the designer whose skills have enriched every area of clothing design – first menswear, then womenswear and finally her line "Liz Harbosin for Olympic Leather" which created an international reputation for Canadian design. She now brings the same power and wit to hat and accessory design.

Vicki Sather, whose creations have graced the covers of many fashion magazines has already produced several lines for the company under the "Vicki Sather for Heaslip" label. Her designs, always fetching, always feminine, can be seen this season in her soft shaped cashmeres and dressier brocades as well as her winning rainhat line.

"Bloomsbury" knit cloche with swirled band of soft suede.

"The Big Picture" plush suede with a generous banding of Italian metallic lamb.

"Après Ski" winter white cotton tapestry trimmed with faux fur.

FTHS offers varied program

TORONTO — Free Torah High School (FTHS), a unique supplementary afternoon Hebrew School program, opens its doors again this September with a varied curriculum at four locations across Metro Toronto.

"This is a totally different type of Hebrew school for today's Jewish teenager. We have classes, multi-media presentations, special events, trips and much more — and it's all free," said FTHS coordinator Dovid Cofnas.

This year, Irving Eisner, a well-known Holocaust survivor and author of two books on the subject, will teach a course which will include personal stories and poignant memories.

"We are very privileged to have Mr. Eisner, who has lectured around the world on this topic, teaching for FTHS. He will take the students on a trip they will never forget, from the death camps of Auschwitz-Birkenau and Dachau, to liberation and freedom, to his present day reflections on what it means to be Jewish in the shadow of the greatest tragedy the world has ever known," said Cofnas.

FTHS is open to students in grades 7 to 13. For more information, call 416-782-4426.

ואני מפחד -
כשאת מפחדת את צועקת,
אני שקט,
פחדך עוד מגדיל, שלי צלקת
משאיר בפנים ולוהט.
כשחושך מאוד, ביתי, את חומקת
ישר אל מתחת לשמיכתי:
לי אין עוד לאן לחמוק בהחלט -
וזה כל ההבדל , ביתי."

הרהורים על החיה שבאדם:

SHMOOZIN
"When I was a child, my parents would speak in Yiddish... "
" ... if they were discussing an adult subject that they didn't want me to understand."
"Nowadays, with all the explicit adult talk that takes place on daytime TV... "
"... I can't help but feel that these shows should be broadcast only in Yiddish."

ROSH HASHANAH FOODS

Before you fast...get ready to eat again!

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

According to my calendar, the half way point of the High Holy Day time line is the "break the fast." Yom Kippur services are over and Sukkot is still a week or so away. Sukkot, however, is not exactly what I'm thinking about when I'm heading out those sanctuary doors after 25 hours of fasting.

I know some people say that after all that time they're really not that hungry, but, for me and most people I know, we want food. Lots and lots of food. We don't want to make it, or wait for it to come out of the oven and woe to anyone who gets between me and the kiddish table. We want it NOW!

The best strategy, as far as I'm concerned, is to have everything ready to go before you head into the fast so that when it's time, you can hit the kitchen floor running.

The following recipes can all be made well in advance of the fast so that all you have to do is throw open the refrigerator door and dig in (just kidding, you can put it on the table if you want).

It's just as easy to break a fast with a dairy as it is meat. There is no one right answer, so make what you're most comfortable with. Most of the recipes, however, are either dairy or parve. For those of you that prefer a meat meal I made sure the recipes are tasty but light enough not to upset your stomach. Enjoy!

CRAZY LAYERED SALAD WITH TUNA MAYONNAISE

- 3 cups torn salad greens (red lead, iceberg, bib, etc.)
- 4 green onions, sliced
- 3 tomatoes, seeded and sliced
- 1 cup fresh basil
- 1 cup diced celery
- 1 cup alfalfa spouts
- 1 small red onion sliced thin
- 1 cup black olives chopped
- 4 ounces salami (optional)
- 4 hard cooked eggs, sliced
- 8 ounces smoked turkey, cubed (optional)
- 1 red pepper cored, and sliced thin
- 1 cup artichoke hearts, cut into quarters
- 1 pound asparagus or broccoli, blanched and cut into small pieces

Tuna Mayonnaise

- 2½ cups mayonnaise
- 1 tbsp. kosher Dijon mustard
- ⅓ cup fresh parsley (or 1 tbsp. dried)
- 2 tbsp. lemon juice

pepper to taste

- 1 6½ ounce can white tuna, drained

Toss the greens with ½ the green onion and celery. In a large salad bowl place the greens on the bottom. Next, place the tomatoes on top of the lettuce. Place ½ the basil over the tomatoes. Then layer with the alfalfa sprouts, onion, half the olives, and all the salami. Next layer the egg on top of the salami and then sprinkle them with a little salt and pepper. Sprinkle the remaining green onion over the top of the egg. Place the turkey over the egg and then cover it with the red pepper. Place the remaining basil on top of the red peppers and then cover with the asparagus. Set aside for a moment.

In a blender or food processor combine all the ingredients for the tuna mayonnaise and process until smooth. Spread the tuna mayonnaise over the asparagus and then top with remaining olives. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate at least 6 hours. Toss well before serving.

(Serves 6 - this can be doubled or tripled)

CORN SLAW

- 1 pound green beans, blanched
- 1 cup peas
- 2 cups corn
- 1 cup chopped celery
- 1 cup chopped green onion
- ½ cup chopped green pepper
- 1 cup shredded red cabbage
- 1 cup sugar
- ½ cup oil
- 2 tbsp. water
- ⅔ cup kosher wine vinegar
- ½ tsp. salt
- ½ tsp. pepper

In a blender combine the sugar, oil, water, vinegar, salt and pepper. Blend well. In a large bowl combine the remaining ingredients and toss with dressing. Refrigerate. Toss before serving.
(serves 6 to 8 - this can be doubled or tripled)

Chocolate lovers rejoice with some tasty treats

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

If someone wanted to torture me to glean some vital state secret, they wouldn't have to pull off my fingernails or any other vulnerable part of my body.

All they would have to do is wave some rich chocolate confection under my nose, and my willpower would be non-existent.

Most of us like chocolate. That's why Baker's Best Chocolate Cookbook (Brimar Publishing, 1995) is such a treat.

Wonderful color photographs and lip-smacking recipes are offered in an easy to follow format. I would prefer that the pages not be quite so glaring, but heck, how else can the pictures look so doggone appealing?

By the way, it is nice to know that the majority of Baker's chocolate projects are kosher, so users of this cookbook don't have to try to find alternatives to the listed ingredients.

Sure, most of the recipes are very rich, but, after all, doesn't it say in some scholarly work that nothing has calories on holidays?

Pralines'n Cream Cheesecake

Crust
1 cup kosher graham crumbs
½ cup finely chopped pecans
⅓ cup butter or margarine, melted
¼ cup brown sugar, packed

Filling
½ cup chopped pecans
¼ cup packed brown sugar
¼ cup butter or margarine, melted
2 pkgs. kosher cream cheese, softened
¾ cup packed brown sugar
1 envelope (7 g.) kosher unflavored gelatin
¼ cup cold water
1 cup whipping cream, whipped
4 squares semi-sweet chocolate, melted and cooled

Crust: Combine crust ingredients. Press onto bottom and 1 inch up sides of 8½ inch springform pan.

Filling: For praline mixture, combine pecans, ¼ cup brown sugar and melted butter, mixing well with fork. Set aside.

Beat cream cheese and remaining sugar with electric mixer until smooth.

Sprinkle gelatin on top of cold water in saucepan. Let stand 5 minutes to soften. Stir mixture over heat until gelatin is dissolved. Blend warm gelatin into cheese mixture. Fold cheese mixture into whipped cream.

Measure 2 cups of the cheese mixture. Fold in chocolate and blend well. Spread all but ½ cup plain cheese mixture into prepared pan.

Sprinkle praline mixture over top. Spread chocolate cheese mixture evenly over praline.

Spoon remaining plain cheese mixture over chocolate mixture and swirl surface with knife to marble. Chill at least 3 hrs.

Serves 10 to 12.

FRESH PEACH COBBLER

⅓ cup brown sugar
½ cup water
4 cups peaches, peeled, sliced and sprinkled with sugar dash of nutmeg
1 tbsp. butter or margarine
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tbsp. sugar
½ cup sifted flour
½ cup sugar
½ tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. salt
2 tbsp. soft butter or margarine
1 egg slightly beaten
½ tsp. cinnamon

Preheat oven to 400°. In a large sauce pan combine the cornstarch, brown sugar, white sugar, and water. Add the peaches and cook until the mixture is thickened (about 15 minutes). Stir constantly. Remove from heat and add the butter, lemon juice, and nutmeg. Pour the peach mixture into a greased 3 quart baking dish. Set aside. In a bowl combine the remaining flour, sugar, baking powder, salt, butter/margarine and egg. Mix well and drop mixture over the top of the fruit. Spread evenly over top. Don't worry if it doesn't quite cover, the topping will spread during cooking. You can sprinkle additional sugar and cinnamon on top of the batter before baking. Bake 40 to 50 minutes. Serve warm with sweetened whipped topping or ice cream. (serves 6)

BLUEBERRY GRUNT

3 cups blueberries
⅔ cup sugar
½ tsp. cinnamon
¼ tsp. nutmeg
¼ tsp. mace
1 cup water
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1 cup flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. salt
¾ cup milk
heavy cream, sweetened

In a large sauce pan combine the blueberries, sugar, spices, water and lemon juice. Cook over a moderate heat for 3 to 4 minutes stirring occasionally. Remove the fruit mixture from the heat. In a bowl combine the flour, baking powder, sugar and salt. Start with a ½ cup of milk, gradually stir the milk into the flour mixture. Add only enough milk to make a dumpling dough that will slide off the spoon.

Return the blueberry mixture to the heat and bring it to a simmer. Drop the dumplings, in heaping tablespoons, over the fruit mixture. The dumplings should not touch and be about 1½ inch across. Cover the mixture and simmer for 15 to 20 minutes. Remove from heat, spoon the dumplings into serving dishes and spoon the blueberry mixture over them. Serve with a sweetened shipped topping or a milk or parve ice cream. (serves 4 to 6)

SOUTHWESTERN CHEESE PIE

1 cup finely crushed kosher tortilla chips
3 tbsp. margarine, melted
16 ounces cream cheese, softened
2 eggs
8 ounces shredded kosher colby or Monterey Jack cheese
2 tsp. taco seasoning (you can add more if you like)
1 cup sour cream
1 cup chopped red pepper
½ cup chopped green onions
⅓ cup chopped tomatoes
½ cup black olives, chopped

Preheat oven to 325°. Stir together the taco chips and margarine. Press them into the bottom of a 9-inch spring form pan. Bake for 15 minutes. In a mixing bowl combine the cream cheese and eggs. Mix well until blended. Mix in the cheese and taco seasoning. Pour the mixture over the cooked crust and then return to the oven for an additional 30 minutes. Remove from the oven and spread the cream cheese over the top. Run a knife around the edge but cool before removing the rim. Chill thoroughly. Sprinkle the remaining ingredients on top just before serving. Slice very thin pieces because this is rich. Serve with additional taco chips and salsa. (serves 16)

ROSH HASHANAH FOODS

Fruits definitely enhance old fashioned favorites

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Year after year, drought or monsoon, Hashem blesses us with his summer bounty. It's an amazing thing to behold - unless, of course, in his benevolent way he blesses you with the equivalent of a small third world country's bumper crop of fruits. You can acquire this munificience by getting carried away in the produce section, a road side stand or in your garden, seemingly overnight. All of a sudden you're wading in watermelon and buried blueberries.

I know, I know, there are worse things in the world than being saddled with 16 quarts of strawberries, 2 bushels of peaches or 5 buckets of cherries. But often, our other concerns don't seem quite as urgent as finding ways to use up all of our fruit before it spoils.

You can try giving some of it away. This solution, while expedient (as well as being extremely well endorsed by the sages of old) really doesn't give you the immediate satisfaction (and taste and calories) as eating it does. Besides, if you've got a ton of fruit it's highly probable that your friends do too.

Your next logical conclusion could be to make pies or jelly and jam. Well, this solution is OK - but let's face it, aren't you just a little tired of using the same old recipes year after year?

So what are the other options, you ask. You can (in alphabet order) make a Betty, Buckle, Cobbler, Crisp, Crumble, Fool, Grunt, Pandowdy or a Plate Cake.

Don't have a clue as to what some of these are? Well don't worry. Most of these old fashion favorites are EASY to make and are variations of each other. They can be made either parve or dairy. All of them are wonderful when served with ice cream, a whipped topping, and/or a vanilla sauce.

Below you'll find a list of simple definitions to help make your dessert choosing a little less confusing.

BETTY: Fruit mixture topped with buttered bread crumbs and then baked until the topping is golden and fruit is bubbly.

BUCKLE: Fruit mixture topped with yellow or white cake batter and baked until the topping is golden and fruit is bubbly.

COBBLER: Fruit mixture is covered with biscuits or pastry dough (it can be rolled, cut or dropped) and baked until the topping is golden brown and fruit is bubbly.

CRISP: Fruit mixture is topped with a crumbly mixture of butter, flour, sugar and nuts and then baked until the fruit mixture is bubbly and the topping is browned.

CRUMBLE: Basically the same as a crisp but you add oatmeal and delete the nuts to the topping mixture.

FOOL: Fruit mixture is covered with crumbled cookies, usually macaroons and served cold.

GRUNT: Fruit mixture is topped with a drop biscuit, covered and then baked. The entire mixture is steamed instead of being baked.

PANDOWDY: The fruit mixture is covered with a pastry, and partially baked (just until the crust is set). The pan is removed from the oven, the crust cut, pushed down (slightly) into the fruit mixture and then returned to the oven to bake until the crust is golden.

RASPBERRY FOOL

1 quart raspberries, washed and dried powdered sugar to taste
3 tbsp. whipped cream
2 tbsp. kirsh or flavored liqueur
1 to 1½ cups macaroons, broken up

Combine the raspberries and powdered sugar, mix gently. Let stand for about 10 minutes and then add the cream and liqueur. Chill well, top with crumbled macaroons and serve. (serves 4)

CHERRY APPLE CRISP

4 cups tart apples, peeled and sliced
4 cups pitted sweet cherries
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tbsp. flour
2 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ cup flour
½ cup brown sugar
¼ cup butter or margarine (add ¼ tsp. salt if using unsalted butter)
1 tsp. cinnamon

Preheat oven to 375°. In an oven proof bowl combine the apples, cherries, lemon juice, 2 tablespoons sugar, 1 tablespoon flour and 1 teaspoon cinnamon. Mix well and set aside. In a medium bowl combine the remaining flour, brown sugar, butter or margarine, and cinnamon. Mix well, it will remain crumbly. Sprinkle the crumble mixture over the top of the fruit and bake for 30 to 40 minutes. Cool slightly and serve. This can also be served cold. (serves 6).

LEMON BLUEBERRY COBBLER

1½ cup sugar
½ cup flour
1 tsp. salt
2 quarts blueberries
2 tbsp. lemon juice
3 tbsp. butter or margarine
2 cups sifted flour
4 tsp. baking powder
2 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. salt
½ cup shortening
⅔ cup milk or non dairy creamer
1 egg, slightly beaten

Preheat oven to 400°. In a large bowl combine 1½ cups sugar, ½ cup flour, 1 teaspoon salt, blueberries and lemon juice. Mix well and pour into a greased 9x13 pan or a quart baking dish. Place mixture in the oven and bake about 15 minutes. While the mixture is baking, in a large bowl sift together the flour, baking powder, 2 tablespoons of sugar and salt. Cut in the shortening until the mixture becomes crumbly. Add the milk and slightly beaten egg to the dry ingredients. Stir until well blended. Take the hot blueberry mixture out of the oven and drop the topping mixture in 12 portions on to the top of it. Return the mixture to the oven and bake approximately 20 minutes or until the topping is brown. (serves 10 to 12)

Things to do for the High Holy Days

By DEENA RESNICKOFF
Special to The CJN

These activities will help you to become even more involved in your family's Jewish New Year celebration. You'll also have a lot of fun.

SHANAH TOVAH GREETINGS:

Wish your family and friends Shanah Tovah with a big card. Find a piece of very large, heavy paper or even cardboard. You can try to fold it in half to look like an actual greeting card or just leave it as is. Decorate your "giant-sized Jewish New Year's card" to express to your friends and family what Rosh Hashanah means to you and the good wishes you have for them. Display your card somewhere in your home so they will receive your Jewish New Year's greetings.

THE FESTIVE ROSH HASHANAH MEAL:

Many of us gather together with our family and friends for a sumptuous meal. We set the dinner table with our finest dishes. If you had the job of designing fancy china for your family's Rosh Hashanah dinner what would it look like? Create your very own on some plain, white paper plates with crayons and markers. Try to design the "china" so it relates to your special Rosh Hashanah dinner.

SETTING THE TABLE FOR YOUR ROSH HASHANAH DINNER:

Book helps answer questions about G-d

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Most people believe in G-d – or say they do. But a lot of us have questions about what G-d is like, how He works and what He means in our lives. Even parents and other grownups sometimes have trouble with those questions.

A really good book that can help us is Partners With G-d, by Gila Gevirtz, published by Behrman House in 1995. It is full of beautiful colored pictures, parables (parables are stories that explain something), crafts, things to think about and ideas for projects.

For instance, you can make a chart of the mitzvot you did, like sending a get-well card, watering plants or reciting a blessing.

Partners with G-d is not only about laws Jews are commanded to perform. You learn that G-d is in everything, including in the human body, in nature and in everyday actions.

Many people wonder how G-d can allow terrible tragedies to happen. A whole chapter talks about how faith keeps us strong and able to cope with problems.

Although this book is written for children, there is a lot for you to discuss with your parents, and activities you can do with them or with your friends and other family members.

Kids, color in Jenn and Josh and send it to us. Write your name, address and phone number on the back. We'll put them into a hat and select three winners. Each winner will receive a cheque for $20.

Al-Aksa prayers quiet despite call for protest

By LEORA EREN FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM – Moslem prayers at the Temple Mount proceeded quietly last Friday despite Yasser Arafat's call to Palestinians to ignore the closure and converge on the Al-Aksa mosque.

Israeli troops reinforced roadblocks to prevent an anticipated 100,000 Palestinians from the territories from entering Jerusalem. But there were no clashes and only about 15,000 Moslems came to worship at the mosque – half the number that usually pray there on Fridays.

Analysts were puzzled by the small turnout, given Arafat's much-publicized call for a show of strength to protest the settlement policy of Benjamin Netanyahu's government's and the delay in resuming talks. Some said that strict enforcement of the closure prevented more Palestinians from arriving.

"Many of the regular worshippers might have stayed away because they were worried about the possibility of disturbances," speculated Chief Police Inspector Assaf Hefetz who positioned 2,000 police at the Temple Mount.

Others maintain that the poor showing was an indication of eroding support for Arafat. However, on Thursday, most Palestinians in the West Bank, Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem heeded Arafat's call for a general strike and shut down shops and businesses.

Arafat's speech last week to Palestinian legislators in Ramallah marked his first call for civil disobedience since the Oslo agreement was signed. Israeli officials were concerned that his words could rekindle the six-year intifadah that ended with the accord.

"The fact that Friday's prayers passed quietly doesn't mean a thing," said MK Chaim Oron of the opposition Meretz party. Oron said that the government's delay in implementing the Oslo accord could weaken Arafat's stand and lead to violence in the territories.

> 'The price could be more grave than the intifadah'

"The price could be a clash that would be much more grave than the intifadah. I'm not sure the tools would be stones and barriers this time," said Oron, who charged the government with talking about negotiations while acting in ways that halt the peace process.

"I'm not worried about an intifadah," countered Rehavam Zeevi of the right-wing Moledet party. "Israel has the tools to fight an uprising. Anyone who threatens Israel with an intifadah is only threatening himself."

Zeevi also said that the small turnout at the Temple Mount "may be a sign that Arafat has lost his influence on Arab residents of Judea and Samaria."

Arafat's call to Israel Arabs to join the protests went completely unheeded.

In urging civil protests, Arafat charged that the Likud government had "declared war on us." His angry words came in response to delays in the resumption of peace talks, approval to build new apartments in the West Bank settlement of Kiryat Sefer and the demolition last week of an East Jerusalem community centre supported in part by Canadian government funds (see accompanying story.)

Meanwhile, at Friday's cabinet session, Netanyahu took a step towards the resumption of talks, by appointing a special ministerial committee to lead the negotiations. The new body, to be headed by Netanyahu himself, will oversee the Palestinian negotiations in general and the Hebron redeployment in particular. National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon was reportedly furious at being excluded from the committee – and voted against it.

The new body will guide the recently formed steering committee – headed by Gen. Dan Shomron – that is charged with implementation of the Oslo accords. Shomron met his Palestinian counterpart Saeb Erekat on Thursday. They will meet again later this month, when the steering committee convenes for its first official negotiating session.

Haredim step up campaign against chief justice

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Security around the Jerusalem home of Israel's chief justice has been intensified as the city's haredi community stepped up its campaign against Aharon Barak and the Supreme Court.

An article this week in Yeted Ne'eman, the newspaper published by the Degal HaTorah party, blasted Barak as a "dangerous enemy" of religious Jews.

The haredi community has long complained that Barak and the Supreme Court have issued rulings that contravene the beliefs and needs of Orthodox Jews.

Religious Jews have assailed Barak about his rulings recognizing gay rights and women's rights.

But the hostility toward the chief justice boiled over with the court's recent decision to keep Bar Ilan Street, a main Jerusalem thoroughfare that passes through religious neighborhoods, open to traffic on the Sabbath.

The court's ruling overturned a decision by Minister of Transportation Yitzhak Levy of the National Religious Party to close the street during hours of prayer on the Sabbath and religious holidays. "Democracy is over. The people's rule is over," the Yeted Ne'eman article stated.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu came to Barak's defense.

"We are a nation of law and the Supreme Court is a cornerstone," he told Army Radio. "We won't allow harm to come to this important central establishment."

Finance Minister Dan Meridor condemned the sharp criticism of Barak.

"It is a system of grave incitement and I don't recall anything like it," Meridor, a former justice minister, told Israel Radio. "It is an attempt to shake the foundations of the rules of the game of Israeli society."

Leaders of Orthodox political parties, while denouncing the use of violence, said their community had a legitimate right to voice its views.

The real issue is the "delegitimization of the religious people in Israel," Knesset member Avraham Ravitz of the United Torah Judaism Party told Israel Radio.

Rule of law

Degal HaTorah is one of the two parties that makes up United Torah Judaism.

But others warned against an escalation of incitement that would spill over into violence, much like the climate that preceded the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in November.

Rabin's widow, Leah, said Barak should "fear for his life."

The Supreme Court justices did not comment on the latest attack in the religious newspaper, but a senior source in the Supreme Court said Barak was not concerned for his personal safety.

Barak is convinced that "these attacks against himself and the court will recede, and the voices of reason in the state will overcome them," a court source was quoted as saying in the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot.

The source said Barak was determined to preserve the rule of law in Israel and that "no individual will scare him."

Syrian track stalled

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Israel's contentious peace talks with Syria have come to a standstill despite Israeli and American efforts to revive them.

Mideast Analysis

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Foreign Minister David Levy have put out peace feelers, while American Secretary of State Warren Christopher and U.S. special envoy Dennis Ross have travelled to the region in an attempt to resurrect the negotiations.

But their efforts have floundered, and as of this week there were few signs on the horizon that Israel and Syria would be talking any time soon. The Syrian track is effectively frozen, posing the danger that Syria may resort to drastic measures to regain the Golan Heights from Israel.

This is not a fanciful scenario. Late last month, Israel and Syria exchanged bitter words, as both countries tested missiles and Syria held military exercises in Lebanon. And in an article in Ha'aretz, Ze'ev Maoz — head of the Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University — warned that Syria may initiate hostilities to break the current diplomatic impasse. He added that Netanyahu's notion of making peace with Syria without giving up the Golan is a "fantasy."

Maoz's sombre assessment is shared by Brig.-Gen. Ya'acov Amidror, who heads the Israeli army's intelligence research branch. In an appearance before the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee in June, Amidror predicted that Syria would not continue with the peace process, and might even turn to an "aggressive policy," if it concluded that Israel had no intention of withdrawing from the Golan.

The previous Israeli government, led by Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres, accepted the concept of territorial compromise. Rabin and Peres were reportedly prepared to pull back to the international border, as opposed to the June 4, 1967 lines, in exchange for a full-fledged peace treaty.

Despite Israel's flexibility, Israel and Syria were unable to bridge their differences. Serious gaps remained with regard to the depth and timing of an Israeli withdrawal, security arrangements and water rights.

Last March, after a series of devastating suicide bombings in Israeli cities, perpetrated by Palestinian Islamic fundamentalists, Israel unilaterally broke off contact with Syria. Peres blamed the Syrians for the breakdown: Syria had neither condemned terrorism nor sent condolences to Israel after the bombings (which claimed the lives of 59 people). Furthermore, Syria was cynically supporting Hezbollah's increasingly effective military operations in southern Lebanon.

Israel's chances of renewing its dialogue with Syria, such as it was, have diminished with the ascendancy of a right-wing government in Israel which rejects the land-for-peace formula.

Netanyahu is supposedly ready to conduct negotiations with Syria "without preconditions." But according to his government's guidelines, the retention of "Israeli sovereignty over the Golan will be the basis for an arrangement with Syria."

Likud's policy, therefore, flies in the face of Syria's determination to wrest control of the Golan from Israel. At Syria's behest, the recent Arab summit in Cairo passed a resolution stating that the land-for-peace precept is the only way to settle the Arab-Israeli conflict. Later, Syria's foreign minister, Farouk Shara, said that "any attempt to violate or change the basis of the peace process would not succeed."

The U.S. ambassador to Israel, Martin Indyk, evidently agrees with the Syrians on this point. Syria, he suggested in July, is "prepared to normalize its relations with Israel" if Israel pays the price: a Golan withdrawal.

In a bid to get a new round of talks going with Damascus, Levy recently declared that Israel was ready for a compromise solution. But Netanyahu immediately distanced himself from Levy's vague remarks, leaving the strong impression that he is inalterably against territorial compromise.

In the aftermath of his election victory, Netanyahu — who has likened Syria to a terrorist state — claimed that Israel would be able to engage Syria in peace negotiations without reference to the Golan by pursuing sub-agreements on water and economic cooperation.

But President Hafez al-Assad of Syria has adamantly dashed these hopes, and Netanyahu has been forced to modify his position.

In August, Netanyahu offered the Syrians a "Lebanon First" proposal, under which Israel would vacate its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon in return for a promise from Syria to disarm Hezbollah and to guarantee the security of Israel's northern border. The Syrians contemptuously dismissed the plan as a public relations exercise, saying that Lebanon and the Golan are inextricably linked.

In response, Netanyahu backtracked, declaring his readiness to discuss "all outstanding issues" — Lebanon and the Golan — simultaneously.

Last week, after a protracted silence, Syria offered to resume the talks on the basis of the land-for-peace formula, and this is where the matter now rests.

Syria indicates willingness to resume peace negotiations

An aide to Netanyahu welcomed al-Sharaa's statement and expressed hope that the Syrians would return to the talks without preconditions.

Meanwhile, Egyptian presidential adviser Osama el-Baz met this week in Paris with the diplomatic adviser to Israel's prime minister, Dore Gold, and U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross.

Gold described the meetings as "very useful."

The talks focused on regional issues, including a Middle East economic conference scheduled to take place in Cairo in November.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak threatened to cancel the conference if there was no progress in Israeli-Palestinian talks.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu phoned Mubarak to assure him that talks with the Palestinian Authority would resume soon.

The latest efforts to get Israel and Syria back to the negotiating table come against the backdrop of recent reports of Syrian troop movements in Lebanon, which security sources said were prompted by concern about a possible Israeli air attack.

The reported Syrian maneuvers came after Israeli government and military officials warned against possible longer-range Katyusha rockets falling into the hands of Hezbollah that could threaten northern Israeli communities, and after the recent test-launch by Syria of a new Scud missile.

Israeli Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai sought to calm any alarm, saying that Israel was not interested in provoking any hostilities.

Mordechai was speaking in Tel Aviv after a ceremony marking the recent successful test of the Arrow-2 anti-missile missile.

U.S. Ambassador Martin Indyk, who was also at the ceremony for the joint Israel-U.S. missile project, said there was no need for panic.

"We don't think it's a situation that is likely to get out of hand," Indyk told reporters. "I think that President Assad has made clear that he is committed to pursue the peace process, as well."

PA urges Canada to help

City and government spokespersons said the demolition was not politically motivated, but simply part of a policy of prohibiting anyone from building without a permit.

But senior PLO official Faisal Husseini said that Palestinians had no choice but to build illegally, because the municipality's discriminatory policies make it virtually impossible for them to receive construction permits.

Canada's contribution to the community centre was mostly in the form of playground equipment. "There is not much vacant space in the Moslem quarter and not many facilities for playing," said Viveash.

Netanyahu, Arafat may meet

by DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – If there are "no untoward events," there could be a meeting between Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat "very soon," an official in the Prime Minister's Office said last week. He refused to elaborate, however.

In a bid to ease mounting tension, Israel and the Palestinians agreed to convene a new steering committee next week to further the implementation of Oslo II. Netanyahu also dispatched a personal envoy to Ramallah to see Arafat.

In a third set of Israeli-Palestinian meetings recently, Netanyahu's diplomatic adviser Dore Gold, along with Israeli negotiator Dan Shomron, met privately with top Palestinian negotiator Mahmoud Abbas.

At the session, both Shomron and Palestinian coordinator Saeb Erekat pledged the steering committee they jointly head would move the peace process forward.

"I think we need many less words and a lot more deeds," Erekat told reporters. "I need to say that Palestinians and Israelis want to be reassured about the status of peace ... by both sides being committed to the reciprocal implementations of the agreements that are signed."

"There will be more meetings ... We intend to work continuously and already next week there will be another meeting of the entire committee," Shomron told reporters.

"Our role as a steering committee is to solve problems and continue the peace process, to do this in a good spirit," Shomron said. "I believe after this meeting that we have the ability to advance all the issues."

Arafat agreed to the Shomron-Erakat meeting after a session with Western diplomats. Netanyahu's friend, attorney Yitzhak Molcho, met last week with Arafat and offered an apology for having Arafat's helicopter hover above the Tel Aviv area for 40 minutes during its flight Wednesday from Gaza to Ramallah. Arafat had interpreted this as a deliberate effort to humiliate him.

Officials said the delay was due to a civil defense exercise being conducted near Ben-Gurion Airport.

Cyprus used as transit point for Syrian chemical weapons

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Cyprus serves as a transit point for a clandestine Syrian effort to produce missiles armed with chemical warheads, intelligence sources and officials here said last week.

The intelligence sources, including those from Western agencies, said Syria has received at least two shipments of material for the manufacture of chemical weapons from the Greek Cypriot port of Limassol.

The shipments have arrived from Russia and Cuba, the sources said, with the Russian consignment reported in December 1995. Officials say other exporters to Cyprus might include several western European countries.

The sources said the CIA has been tracking the shipments, and U.S. officials have quietly asked the Greek Cypriot government to end the consignments. But the Cypriots have reportedly denied the allegations.

Western intelligence sources say Cyprus has increased cooperation with Syria and its terrorist allies over the past year, particularly since Israel signed a military cooperation accord with Turkey.

The new cooperation includes a joint defence accord between Syria and Greece, which has included Cyprus in the pact. Officials of the Turkish Republic of North Cyprus, have called on Washington to stop the Cyprus-Syrian cooperation. But they said so far nothing has been done.

"We draw their attention to this problem," said Resat Catlar, director general of North Cyprus's Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Defence. "For some reason, they are not taking us seriously."

U.S. officials have expressed concern over the use of Cyprus as a base for terrorism and drug money laundering, but they have never made any official accusations.

In March, a State Department report on narcotics control suggested that Cyprus may be used to facilitate the transfer of sensitive items.

"Cyprus customs is considered an income-generating rather than a law enforcement agency," the report said. "Goods entering Cyprus can be re-exported legally using different customs documents, as long as there is no change in the description of the goods exported."

Police, army experts arrive in Canada

JERUSALEM – An Israeli delegation of police and army experts will arrive in Canada this week to purchase $700,000 in sophisticated bomb detection equipment from Canadian firms.

The cost of the equipment is being covered by the Canadian government, which offered the money to Israel following the spate of suicide bombings last spring.

Ottawa has also allocated $300,000 for the same purpose to the Palestinian Authority. An Israeli foreign ministry official said that Canada is the only other country besides the United States that has provided such aid to Israel.

Festival includes films of Jewish interest

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — This year's Toronto International Film Festival (Sept. 5-14) is presenting a rich and varied program of films of Jewish interest.

Themes run the gamut from the Holocaust and the Third Reich to klezmer music and the state of Israeli society following Yitzhak Rabin's assassination.

Andrzej Wajda, Poland's premier director (Ashes and Diamonds, Kanal, Korczak), directs Holy Week, set against the backdrop of the 1943 Warsaw ghetto uprising.

The heroine is a young Jewish woman who finds refuge in the apartment of a non-Jewish couple. Wajda uses this situation to delve into Poland's anti-Semitic past and to explore the nature of Polish-Jewish relations.

To Speak the Unspeakable: The Message of Elie Wiesel follows the famed novelist to his birthplace in a small village in the Carpathian mountains and retraces his harrowing journey to Auschwitz and Buchenwald.

Narrated by William Hurt, Judit Elek's documentary is both a meditation on the Holocaust and an evocation of the shtetl.

The Substance of Fire is about a conflict between a father and his three children. The father, a publisher whose world view is informed by the Holocaust, clashes with his daughter and two sons over the business sense of publishing a history of Nazi medical experiments. The film stars Tony Goldwyn, Timothy Hutton, Ron Rifkin and Sarah Jessica Parker.

Shine, an Australian-British co-production, paints a riveting portrait of David Helfgott, a talented but troubled pianist, and his stormy relationship with his father, a Holocaust survivor who stifles his son.

Grotesque fairy tale

The Ogre, directed by Volker Schlondorf (The Tin Drum, Circle of Deceit) and starring John Malkovich, views Germany's Nazi past through the prism of a grotesque fairy tale. The central character is a kind of European Forrest Gump who witnesses but fails to grasp the significance of seminal events swirling around him.

Conversations with the Beast, directed by the actor Armin Mueller-Stahl, is a fantasy which blends sharp dialogue with burlesque humor. It is about a series of improbable meetings between an American researcher and an aged man purporting to be Adolf Hitler.

The Arena of Murder, the only Israeli movie of the festival, examines the mood of Israel in the wake of a political murder which rocked the country and the Diaspora. Amos Gitai's documentary, filmed between December 1995 and March 1996, is set in several locales.

Jerusalem, a film by Swedish director Bille August (Pelle the Conqueror, Best Intentions and The House of Spirits), moves between Sweden and Palestine and turns on love, sacrifice and religious fundamentalism.

A Tickle in the Heart celebrates the rollicking music and chronicles the resurrected career of the Epstein brothers, who were once known as the kings of klezmer.

Infinity portrays the life and times of the legendary American-Jewish physicist Richard Feynman and the love he shared with a woman who would be his wife. Based on Feynman's memoirs, the film stars Matthew Broderick (who also directs) and Patricia Arquette.

TEL AVIV TAPS TO BROADWAY BEAT

In the not so distant future, perhaps, Israelis won't have to fly to New York or Toronto to take in world-class performances of box-office breaking musicals. Three of Broadway's leading personalities – directors Jack Lee and Wally Harper, and actress Jane Summerhays – have set out, together with Tel Aviv University to help Israel produce the musical on a truly professional level. They recently concluded a four-week session at the university where scenes and songs were performed by the 25 Israelis – some pictured here – selected to participate in the program.

Spielberg Shoah Film Up For Emmy Awards

Survivors of the Holocaust, a one-hour documentary produced by Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation in association with Turner Original Productions, and broadcast by TBS last January, has been nominated for three Emmy Awards, including the first President's Award. The Emmy Awards ceremony takes place Sept. 8 in Los Angeles.

Established earlier this year, the President's Award is given to the program "that best explores social, educational or medical issues and encourages and promotes changes that help society become familiar with and effectively meet the challenge."

Survivors of the Holocaust was the first public presentation of the foundation's work since Steven Spielberg founded it in 1994. In only three years, the foundation has videotaped the largest library of Holocaust survivor testimonies ever recorded. Its staff and volunteers, including Toronto historian Paula Draper, have conducted videotaped interviews with nearly 19,000 Holocaust survivors, while its database holds information on more than 35,000 survivors.

"It's very much a race against time," said Spielberg recently. "The majority of Holocaust survivors are in their 70s and 80s, and the window for capturing their testimony is closing fast."

The foundation is still seeking Holocaust survivors to interview as well as people interested in supporting its efforts. Phone 800-661-2092 or write Shoah Visual History Foundation, P.O. Box 3168, Los Angeles, CA 90078-3168.

Shalom Aleichem Portraits: David Libak, a 36-year-old part-time art consultant and dealer in north Toronto, returns occasionally to his native Russia where he has contacts with many artists. On a recent trip, he became excited on seeing two large framed oil paintings, each nearly a square metre in size, of the Yiddish author Shalom Aleichem, rendered by an octogenarian artist.

Libak is interested in finding a sponsor who will buy the portraits for a school, library or other institution in Canada. "They are good paintings, above average, I think," he said.

The portraits are being offered commercially. To arrange to view photographs of them and some of Libak's Russian paintings, phone him at 416-223-0457.

Artist Explores Jewish-Arab Roots: Fresh Blood, a video by Toronto artist B.H. Yael, uses belly-dancing as its central metaphor as it delves into issues of Jewish and Arab identity and – according to a press release – the "still radical perspective that Palestinians have a right to their own land."

In the 55-minute video, the Israeli-born Yael explores her maternal Iraqi-Jewish heritage and considers issues of "racialized identity." Fresh Blood also explores the bond between grandmother and granddaughter, and the author's metaphysical search for her father who survived the Holocaust.

Yael is an instructor at the Ontario College of Art. Her video is scheduled for screening at The Art Gallery of Ontario's Jackman Hall, Sept. 19 to 22, 8 p.m. nightly; and Sept. 22 at 4.

The series features Nathan Katz, a Florida professor of religious studies; Rabbi Zalman Schachter-Shalomi of Aleph, the Alliance for Jewish Renewal; and Orthodox Rabbi Irving "Yitz" Greenberg, president of CLAL, the National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership in New York.

Each 90-minute tape is $69.95 (US); the set is $299.95. Summit Productions, 5770 Roosevelt Blvd., Suite 301, Clearwater FL 34620.

Israeli growth slows

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The economy is experiencing a slowdown right now, but is far from a recession, Israel's Finance Minister Dan Meridor told the Knesset Finance Committee last week.

"There is no doubt there has been a slowdown in the past few months," he said after the meeting.

However, he stressed, slower growth does not mean a recession.

Recently, the Central Bureau of Statistics predicted 3.5 percent to four percent growth this year, he said. While this is not the rapid pace of the previous few years, when growth reached seven percent, it is still quite respectable, he noted.

Bank of Israel Governor Jacob Frenkel added that the previous high growth had been to some extent artificial, fueled largely by consumption and excess borrowing.

"The slowdown shows that part of the recent growth was unsustainable," Frenkel said.

Regarding the capital markets, Meridor said these could no longer be considered in crisis, since the government's intervention in the bond markets succeeded in stabilizing them somewhat.

Stonehenge's Age Revealed: Scientists have at last been able to reveal the true age of Britain's most famous prehistoric monument. Using radiocarbon dating techniques, they have proved that the mysterious stone circles on Salisbury Plain are 5,000 years old. It is the first time these methods have been used on a World Heritage Site. Another revelation shows that animal bones from the site were buried as relics and were already 200 years old before being put into the ground.

Israeli minister discusses closure with PA official

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Israeli Finance Minister Dan Meridor met with his Palestinian counterpart this week to discuss ways to ease economic hardships of the Palestinians caused by the closure of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Maher Al-Masri warned that if the closure continued, it would no doubt cause social problems that would cause a "derailing of the peace process."

Meridor gave no specifics of the talks with Al-Masri, but said, "there is a common interest to improve the economic situation in the territories under Palestinian jurisdiction and we will work together to promote this interest."

The current closure, which has been in place for some six months, was imposed by the previous Labor government after the first in a series of suicide bombings in February and March in Israel.

The ban, continued by the current government with some easing, has kept tens of thousands of Palestinians from jobs in Israel.

Palestinian officials say unemployment in the West Bank and Gaza Strip has reached an unprecedented 51 percent.

Consultant fumes over restaurant smoking ban

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Douglas Fisher, president of FGH International Inc., consultants to the franchise, food service, retail, tourism and hotel industries, is fuming over Toronto city council's recent decision to ban smoking in restaurants and bars.

As most of his clients are directly affected by the no-smoking issue, Fisher has studied it extensively and concludes that "a no-smoking legislation for restaurants and bars will have a negative impact on every segment of the hospitality industry.

"If restaurateurs could increase profits by offering a smoke-free environment, the smart operators would already be doing it. Good restaurateurs only earn 9.8 percent profit on a pre-debt, interest, depreciation and tax basis. Mid-market and high-end operators are unwilling to take the chance of losing market share and implement a non-smoking environment."

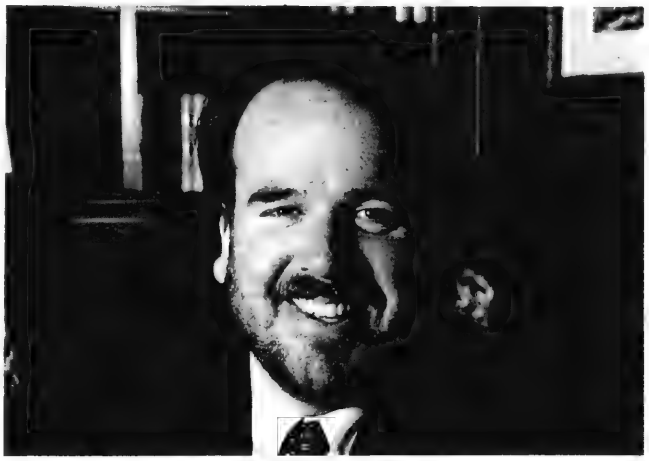
Fisher, who conducted an informal study with one of his clients, a restaurant in Scarborough, says that when the restaurant informed its customers that they were going smoke-free for a two-week trial, "business dropped 50 percent within two days and they lost 30 percent over the 14-day period. They did not attract any new non-smoking customers, but lost their customer base. Six months later the restaurant is still reeling with a 30 percent loss in business. No one expected the impact," says Fisher.

While the impact may be less on fast food operations, he says, smokers, who make up 30 percent of the population, will leave the city core to neighboring communities such as North York or Scarborough, where smoking is not banned. This will certainly have an enormous negative effect on other Toronto business sectors.

"If we have decided that smoking is bad, then it should be outlawed — it should be made 100 percent illegal. We should not take one little industry and make them pay for it. The bylaw is a big, unfair mistake."

Fisher, 40, originally from Montreal, learned the restaurant business from the ground up after leaving York University in the mid-1970s and going to work in a Utah restaurant as a dishwasher.

"From washing dishes, I moved to the kitchen and then went on to manage a restaurant in Ottawa. It was then that I decided to finish the education I had put on hold and after graduating from York University, went on to receive a master of science: hotel and food service management from Florida International University in Miami."



Douglas Fisher, president of FGH International Inc., believes Toronto smoking ban will hurt the restaurant and bar business.

After a stint operating Breakfast in Bed, a gourmet breakfast delivery service, Fisher, who is now married and has two young sons, began a contract, consulting in the hospitality and tourism industry. When he had built up a solid client base he started FGH International Inc. "on a shoestring." It now has two professionals working out of its north Toronto office, one in its 1-year-old Miami office and a resource base of associates.

The mandate of the 12-year-old company is to provide professional consulting services focusing on franchise development and strategic planning to the franchise food service, retail, tourism and hotel industries. It specializes in operational reviews, feasibility studies, market research and evaluations for independent operators, franchisers and international chains in Canada, the United States and abroad. As well, it provides litigation support and arbitration for clients.

"In Florida, our industry slows down in the summer; so that is when the demand for consulting is high. Restaurateurs seek advice when their business is slow and they have time to reflect on their busy season and focus on trying to build up business. No matter how successful a restaurant may appear, an external examination of its operating procedures is almost always beneficial for the operator, especially in an industry where innovations and new techniques are being developed on a continuous basis.

"Restaurants which appear successful as a result of high sales and long lines at the door do not always provide the restaurateur with the financial returns they desire or require. Financially successful restaurants should achieve an operating profit before debt of 10 to 15 percent of sales. If these profit margins are not being achieved, our services can assist the restaurant owner."

What they try to do, says Fisher, is pinpoint a cost problem, provide a practical solution and teach management how to implement that solution with the aim of totally eliminating the cost overrun.

"The menu is the number one sales tool at a restaurateur's disposal and it is essential that it works for, not against, the restaurant. Not only does our menu analysis ensure that selling prices are realistic, we make sure that the menu mix is appealing and satisfying to the clientele and that high profit and high margin items are strategically placed, in order to increase their sales while reducing the sale of loss leader items."

To assist him in his menu development, Fisher developed MenuManager, a software program used to help restaurateurs and hoteliers control their food cost. "The program breaks down recipes by cost and helps with inventory control and waste management. For instance, if someone wants to open a mid-market Italian restaurant, we first do a market study to determine the appropriateness of the site and capital cost requirements for development. This information enables my client to evaluate the potential of the operation while providing lenders and investors with an independent evaluation of the project.

"When the restaurateur is ready, it is then that we get into recipe development. Standardized recipes are the cornerstone to quality and quantity control. With that in mind, we have developed standardized recipes and implemented portion control systems in several restaurants and food service organizations. These systems ensure that consistency is maintained from one cook to the next, on a daily basis. We work closely with chef Dominic Zoffranieri, who is a big help in analyzing recipes."

In the last few years, says Fisher, there has been a big increase in the number of people seeking to purchase franchises. "We can help clients run a successful franchise and as well, we can help put together a franchise program for someone with a successful retail concept. These people need help with such things as market plans, franchise training programs, consultation with solicitors and development of operating and procedure manuals. We are there all the way through."

Fisher, who has been a consultant to among others, Druxy's, Exhibition Place, Guild Inn and several government ministries says his greatest joy is to take a successful company and help it grow.

"A number of successful American restaurant chains have come to Canada and have had difficulty because they do not realize the Canadian marketplace differs from the American marketplace. Our taste in food is different and we have different service standards. As well, they are often not prepared for our tax system. What works in Boston and New York des not necessarily work in Toronto — there are different demographics and different needs.

"Most of these companies have good concepts and could work brilliantly if they would tap into local knowhow. A Canadian consultant can tell them exactly what they need to know."

Psychological test examines emotional well-being

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Don't worry," you may have consoled yourself when your report card listed an F. Or two. "So I don't have book smarts. I have street smarts."

As far as Dr. Reuven Bar-On is concerned, you may have been an early booster of emotional intelligence, which has become one of the buzz-phrases of the '90s.

Coined by two Yale University psychologists about 15 years ago, emotional intelligence is used to describe a wide range of attitudes like happiness, optimism, empathy and one's ability to deal with stress and interpersonal relationships.

It may sound warm and fuzzy, but Bar-On has devised a test that can measure a person's emotional quotient about as empirically as an IQ test can gauge intelligence.

Called the EQ-i, the 152-question quiz probes 15 different aspects of emotional well-being, including things like impulse control and self-regard. It takes between 30 and 45 minutes to complete and has built-in control elements to ensure a respondent is being honest.

Bar-On, a clinical psychologist based near Tel Aviv and a lecturer at Tel Aviv University, took 15 years to construct the test, which has been used on conscripts in the Israeli army and is being employed by the U.S. Air Force and several blue-chip companies, including AT&T, Subaru and Canada Life Assurance, to identify successful, motivated workers.

It's now in use in nine countries and will soon be available in seven languages. Here, the test will be marketed and its results analyzed by Multi-Health Systems Inc. of Toronto, established by Dr. Steven Stein and his wife Rodeen in 1983.

Bar-On was in Toronto recently to introduce the EQ-i at the American Psychological Association's annual convention.

In a CJN interview, he conceded the test is riding the crest of the hugely popular book Emotional Intelligence by U.S. psychologist Daniel Goleman, which stayed on the New York Times bestseller list for 40 weeks and has sold some 700,000 copies. It posited that very bright people can often be terrible navigators of their emotional lives, while those with lower IQs may be happy, even-keeled folks with great people skills. The book's argument — that a person's IQ and emotional health are separate but complementary — struck a huge chord.

"We've been dominated by IQ, and people were ready for something new," said Bar-On in explaining the popularity of the book and his test. "We have seen people with high IQs who don't really succeed, while those with modest IQs can do very well. So something was missing."

Powerful tool

Part of that something, he argues, was the need to recognize that a person changes. IQ scores tend to stay stable starting at about age 18; EQ, on the other hand, is fluid and changes with one's growth and life experiences.

Multi-Health describes the EQ-i as the first scientifically valid measure of a person's emotional health. An average score is about 100.

Bar-On describes the test as a powerful screening tool, both in the business world and in clinical assessment. It "gives a snapshot of where you are today and predicts your ability to succeed and cope with pressures. It measures ability to be aware of one's emotions and the ability to assert them in a non-destructive way."

His research shows that women tend to have better interpersonal skills than men and display more social responsibility, while men are better at handling stress. "But I can't say why," Bar-On adds.

Interest in the test has been "explosive," he says, and one for children is in the works in order to identify stress early.

"I feel good about being from Israel," Bar-On says, sounding very emotionally "centred" himself. "And I feel proud that I've developed something useful."

Swimmer leads Maccabi team with two golds

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nir Rotenberg isn't making much of a to-do about his six-medal performance at the JCC Maccabi Youth Games in West Orange, N.J. recently.

Maybe it's his experience at other swim meets that has made him slightly jaded or perhaps he was still a little groggy after being awoken for a telephone interview at 10:30 in the morning.

Still, the 15-year-old swimmer had plenty to boast about after winning two gold, two silver and two bronze medals at the youth event that attracted athletes from across North America and Israel.

Rotenberg was first in the 50-metre freestyle, first in the 200-m breast-stroke second in the 100 free and 100 breast. He was also part of the 200-m medley relay team that won a bronze medal and a member of the 200-m freestyle relay team that also finished third.

Rotenberg racked up his best-ever time by a half-second in the 50-m freestyle and was one second off his best time in the 200-m breast-stroke. Not bad for a guy who wasn't even in top shape going into the meet.

For Rotenberg, participating in the Youth Games was a fun experience, a chance to meet new people and make friends from around the world.

He particularly enjoyed the red carpet treatment he got from the host family who billeted him, and speaking Hebrew with athletes from Israel.

As for the competition itself, well, he's faced tougher challenges at swim meets in Ontario, he says. A member of the York Swim Club, Rotenberg has swum against top athletes from other provincial swim clubs and he's even won more than the six medals he earned in Jersey.

Earlier this year, he qualified for the Youth Nationals in Nepean, Ont. Unfortunately, he didn't do as well as he'd hoped, finishing only in the top 35. "I was too excited, there was too much pressure," he says of his disappointing performance.

Rotenberg, who's going into Grade 11 at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate, started swimming when he was six back in Israel after a doctor recommended an aquatic lifestyle to help him strengthen his back.

After the family moved to Toronto when he was seven and a half, he continued to swim but he didn't take the sport seriously until he joined the York Swim Club about five or six years ago.

Now he trains up to eight times a week in sessions that last from an hour and a quarter to two and a half hours. On Monday and Friday, he trains twice a day.

"If I don't do it, I'll lose when I race," he explains. "I won't be at the same level as the competition. They do it. They swim even more."

Nir Rotenberg

During the swim season, Rotenberg competes in inter-club meets about every three weeks. But going in the Youth Games, he concedes he wasn't in the best condition and neither were the other Toronto swimmers, he said.

Their coach, Alison Lee, agrees with that evaluation. Many of the swimmers had been to summer camp and the only preparation they got was swimming in lakes.

Still, they finished with nine medals, a creditable performance under the circumstances, she said.

Lee, the aquatic director at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, said the swimmers "were running on heart and the desire to do the best they could even if they weren't in top shape."

Swimmers from Israel and Los Angeles, the competition's powerhouses, were "shaved and tapered," she said, referring to the practice of shaving body hair to give swimmers a better feel for the water.

"Nir is an excellent swimmer," she continued. "He was the leader. He has the desire to win. He really wanted to come in first and he motivated the others."

Rotenberg's gold medal performances motivated the other swimmers and his support helped create good team camaraderie, Lee said.

In addition to Rotenberg's medal haul, other Toronto swimmers finished in the top three: Beth Albert won a bronze in the 200-m backstroke; Jordan Chitley won a bronze in the 200-m butterfly; and Aliza Goodman won a bronze in the 200-m breaststroke.

The 200-m medley relay team — Rotenberg, Steven Jacobson, Albert and Anna Dewar — won a bronze while the 200-m freestyle team also won a bronze. It was composed of Rosenberg, Dewar, Albert and Marc Singer.

Toronto athletes grab 19 medals

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto's athletes are back from the swamps of Jersey with 19 medals, including seven golds, earned at the JCC Maccabi Youth Games.

Swimmer Nir Rotenberg led the way with six medals, including two gold, while runner Elizabeth Ben-Ishai captured two golds and tennis players Sean Weinberg and Samantha Gutstadt each finished first in their events.

Ben-Ishai's golds came in the 400-metre and the 800-m runs.

Other than Rotenberg (see accompanying story), Jody Naiberg earned the team's only other silver medal in the high jump.

In golf, Eric Herman won a bronze medal in the 13 to 14-year-old category while in the pool Beth Albert (200-m backstroke), Jordan Chitley (200-m butterfly) and Aliza Goodman (200-m breaststroke) each won a bronze. Two swimming relay teams also finished third (see accompaning story).

The boys' baseball team, the girls' volleyball team and the tennis team each won a bronze medal.

Jim Emery, captain of the Toronto team, said the opening ceremonies were among the best ever staged for a Youth Maccabi Games. Held at the Continental Airlines Arena at the Meadowlands, the event attracted more than 15,000 spectators and included a spectacular fireworks display and a tribute to the Israeli athletes killed by terrorists at the 1972 Munich Olympics.

The games were attended by 2,500 teen athletes from across North America and Israel. Toronto sent 90 youngsters to the games, which were held in West Orange, N.J.

The Inside Back

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

My father lives alone and refuses to be placed where he can get the help he needs. He has fallen several times during the past three months. One time, he was on the floor for two hours and fortunately I came to visit and called 911. He had cracked his ribs. His judgment is poor and I worry about him all the time.

The doctor told Papa that he should not live alone. His medications can cause dizziness. His house is messy and he is not getting proper nutrition. I help him when I can, but I know he would be safer in a nursing home. How can I convince him?

J.P.

Dear J.P.,

If your father has the capacity to make decisions that do not threaten his life or anyone else, you cannot impose your will. Just state your own concerns and be clear about what you can and cannot do for him. There may be other options – a security system, a neighbor, or the postman might ring his doorbell daily, just to make sure all is well.

Most people dread the thought of losing their independence. The thought of their child taking control is particularly painful. You may want to seek help from someone who is his peer and less personally involved to help him realize the risks in his living alone.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

The Supreme Court and religious issues

By DAVID ELIEZRIE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

The long-simmering debate about Israel's Supreme Court has come out into the open, with haredi newspapers attacking its president Aharon Barak as being dangerous to both Judaism and democracy.

While the tone of some of the articles crosses the lines of decency, the issues raised are important and need airing.

It was the court's decision to block implementation of the closure of Jerusalem's Bar-Ilan Street during Shabbat prayer times that acted as the catalyst for the public debate.

The court split on ideological grounds. The majority, led by Barak, elected to establish yet another public commission to examine the issue. The lonely voice of the court's only religious justice, Tzvi Tal, stood in opposition to the majority.

The court's decision illustrates the judicial activism practised by the Barak court. In a legal system lacking the clear guidelines of a constitution, this type of judicial intervention has been both good and bad. It has arrested abuses of human rights; but on the other hand, it has at times forced an uncalled-for secular mandate on sensitive religious issues.

In the United States, there is also a debate between jurists on the left, who believe in reinterpreting the Constitution, and those on the right, who see it as an unchangeable document. But both groups work within constitutional limits.

In Israel, the judicial playing field has no limits. Israeli law is a mixture of different legal traditions. Commonly, Israeli justices will refer to Turkish, British, talmudic and modern American case law to support their opinions.

The fault-lines in Israel run not left to right as in the United States, but from religious to secular. And the Supreme Court is clearly stacked in favor of the secular.

For decades the court has practised judicial tokenism. There has always been a religious justice so that the government could claim that the Jewish legal tradition was being represented. However, this religious influence was always checked by the fact that it was restricted to just one voice.

Religious justices have made distinguished contributions to the court, but have felt frustrated by their minority status, which harms the case for equal protection under the law.

The situation is reminiscent of the policy in the American South prior to the civil rights movement. One could certainly find a black judge or police officer in various places – but these were never more than token appointments.

Israel's court functions both as a Court of Appeal and as a Supreme Court. Many cases are heard by only three justices.

In the present situation, judgments on sensitive religious issues are handed down without the voice of tradition being heard. Many cases that come under appeal are adjudicated by only three justices; a religious justice is not necessarily present on the bench. The result has been that many of the judgments passed have heightened religious-secular tensions in the country.

Had a religious justice participated in the court's deliberations, chances are some of these tensions could have been avoided.

Close to one-third of Israel's population is religiously observant, and an additional significant percentage is traditional. If Israel's Supreme Court is to be truly representative of the society it serves, it must have four or five religious justices on the bench and not just one.

An infusion of religious justices would bring about a greater balance in the court, turning it into a place where distinguished scholars can adjudicate difficult legal issues seeking precedents from both contemporary and Jewish law.

As long as the current situation continues, as long as Israel has an activist court with a sole religious voice – one justice out of 14 – that court will likely go on handing down decisions that deepen division in Israel.

By ANDREW M. SACKS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

One hallmark of a true democracy is an independent judiciary, and Israel's Supreme Court has had the courage in recent years to act, even when its decisions have not evoked wide popular applause.

An independent judiciary requires that the public, the police, the executive branch and the legislature honor – even while not always agreeing with – court decisions. But our haredi political parties see things differently.

The Supreme Court recently ruled that Bar-Ilan Street be kept open to traffic on Shabbat pending a final decision. Recognizing the magnitude of the issue, it further ruled that the whole subject of street closings required more study.

This wasn't to the liking of the haredi parties and over the past week, haredi newspapers have blasted the Supreme Court, alternatively referring to it as "a branch of Meretz" and a dupe of the Reform and Conservative Jews.

But this hackneyed rhetoric isn't the whole story.

There are reports that several MKs from religious parties have drafted legislation requiring Supreme Court judges to win Knesset confirmation. Knesset approval would also be required for those already serving on the bench.

United Torah Judaism MK Rabbi Avraham Ravitz was quoted as saying: "We may have to enact very clear and explicit legislation regarding the authority of the Supreme Court... We need to fix it."

And Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, Shas' spiritual mentor, reportedly said that the time had come "to rein in the Supreme Court because its actions make religious Jews feel as if we are still in exile."

Yet the charge that the religious community is not represented by the courts is unfounded. A recent survey revealed that over 30 percent of judges were educated at religious schools.

And what of the rabbinical courts? The entire Jewish population is being held hostage to the rabbinical courts in countless matters of personal status, over which these courts reign supreme. Often, for example, these courts leave women at the mercy of men who refuse to grant them a divorce.

They keep secret "black lists" of those they will not allow to marry, and retroactively invalidate conversions to Judaism when it suits their purposes, sometimes years after the conversion took place. They subject couples to humiliating hearings on matters of the most personal nature.

Why, since these courts also "serve" the entire Jewish populace, should we not see Masorti/Conservative, Reform, Meimad, and women representatives serving as judges? Why not require Knesset approval of the rabbis who serve these courts?

Some seeking to bolster the haredi position point out that in the United States, federal judges are confirmed by Congress. But this is hardly a fair comparison. Congressional approval of judges is essentially pro forma (except in the case of Supreme Court justices). And even then theology is rarely an issue. Republicans routinely approve Democrat appointees, as Democrats approve Republican ones.

Woe to the American system should it set quotas on the number of Jewish, Christian or agnostic judges; or if Congress were to compromise the independence of the judiciary because a minority of fundamentalist religious fanatics rejected the court's authority.

In Israel, we are witness to daily haredi outbursts. The post office in Jerusalem's Geula neighborhood employs only men. The Super-Sol supermarket in Givat Shaul has a dress code for its women customers. Female employees working at the Ministry of Education are not allowed to bare their arms if they want to make it safely to and from their cars. Now these same self-righteous vigilantes seek to manipulate one of the few bastions of independence that forms an essential part of Israeli democracy.

One can only hope that a majority of our 120 MKs will see the folly of giving in to this approach.

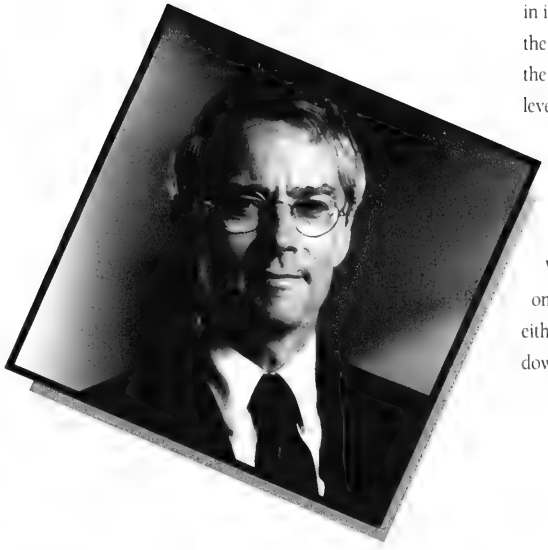
The NEED for MEAN

The way ahead presents us with a challenge: to become the community we need to be, a community that expresses and embodies the Jewish values that are as old as time and remain as timely as ever.

Life Is Good

By almost any measure, Toronto's Jewish community has never had it quite so good. Our population has doubled in less than a generation. There are now nearly 170,000 of us. We have worked hard and it shows: in impressive educational achievements; in the success we have enjoyed in business and the professions; and in an unprecedented level of economic prosperity.



Ideals Jews have always held sacred continue to shape our lives:

Our desire for community continues. We choose, by and large, to live close to one another, mostly within a few blocks on either side of Bathurst Street from right downtown to up beyond Steeles.

I believe that the Jewish community of Toronto is vibrant and strong. But it cannot be taken for granted. Our continuing support is mandatory.

Lawrence Bloomberg

Our commitment to Jewish family remains strong. Family is at the heart of our lives, and research shows that Toronto's Jewish families are more stable than those in the general community and the country as a whole. Our desire to affiliate with the community's institutions has led us to renew old shuls, to create new ones, and to build new schools up north. It has us seeking and finding a full spectrum of opportunities to live a Jewish life, regardless of where in the city we live or where we locate ourselves on the spiritual continuum.

We live as Jews in a city and a country where racial hatred in general, and anti-Semitism in particular, are not tolerated. We live in a world where Israel, while by no means secure, has embarked upon a path to peace.

Yes, life here is good. And yet, it isn't quite good enough.

Something Is Missing

For all we have to celebrate, there is considerable cause for concern. Having attained so much of what we wanted, we have yet to get what we need. As Jews. As a Jewish community. We live somewhere between what we were and what we must become.

The Toronto of our parents was far less comfortable and secure. But it had its pluses: common origins in Europe; common struggles to make a home and build a community; a common cause in the support of Israel and of Jews in peril elsewhere in the world. Those were tougher times. We can see now that they were also simpler times. Some would say better times. We knew who we were, and we were clear about what we valued.

ING

Those days are gone. Today, we live in a community in transition.

- Our community draws Jews from across Canada and around the world by the tens of thousands, yet it is so difficult for them to feel at home here.
- Our increasing diversity could be a source of strength, yet, instead, it has become divisive.
- We live so close to one another, yet we often feel disconnected.
- We respond to the limitless number of community causes that appeal to our individual concerns, yet we seem to have lost our shared ideals.
- We feel deeply about the future of Israel, yet our commitment is eroding in the face of impending peace and growing economic prosperity.

In the past, we were bound together by who and where we were. Let us hope that in the future we will rediscover and redefine who we are and what we value.

We Are What We Value

The way ahead presents us with a challenge: to become the community we need to be, a community that expresses and embodies the Jewish values that are as old as time and remain as timely as ever.

G-d. Torah. Israel.

Justice. Tzedakah. Peoplehood. Knowledge. Freedom.

These are the values that define us as Jews and as a Jewish community. Together, they are the foundations of Jewish life. They provide the framework for building a Jewish community.

The time has come for a reaffirmation of these core values as the basis for renewing and revitalizing Toronto's Jewish community. We need to harness the power of our ideals and redefine our sense of community — for ourselves, for our children, for the future.

I believe in the centrality of the Jewish family. This community works to support the health, strength, and continuity of Jewish family life.

Michael Rosenberg

I believe that one of our community's greatest strengths is its spiritual diversity — there's room for each and every one of us to practise our faith as we see fit.

Zameret Kleiman

I believe in this community because it provides help and hope for the 21,000 Toronto Jews who live in poverty.

Michael Bregman

The PILLARS of Our COMMU

Houses of worship. Homes for the elderly. Educational institutions. Cultural and recreation centres. Health and human services. Programs that build Israel and rescue Jews in peril around the world. These are the pillars of our community. They reflect our ideals. Embody our priorities. Enable us to translate the principles of Jewish life into practice: Spirituality. Education. Culture. Well-being. Advocacy.

The quality of our lives as Jews and the success of our community depend on the strength of our institutions. And today, that quality is imperilled, that success is in jeopardy. Changing needs and a growing range of demands are challenging the capacity of our community's institutions and services to respond.

Spirituality: Our Belief Endures

We remain a community whose spirituality is expressed in the observance of our faith. Essential rituals endure: lighting Shabbat and Hannukah candles; attending seders; fasting on Yom Kippur; celebrating the holidays.

As the community has become increasingly diverse and dispersed, new synagogues have sprung up; others have been reborn. In Thornhill and downtown. Out on the Danforth and in Bathurst Manor. In the Beaches and in Kensington Market. We have become a community searching for and finding new ways of practising our faith.

The newly emerging spiritual and community needs must be met. At the same time, the older, more established synagogues require sustained support.

Education: The Pursuit of Knowledge Continues

How should we live our lives? How must we raise our children? How should we conduct our affairs in the world, and relate to one another? How can we make sense of existence itself? The search for answers to these and so many other questions is at the centre of Jewish life.

We begin our quest for knowledge in childhood and continue it for a lifetime. Our system of Jewish education is extensive. For our children, there are Orthodox, Conservative and Reform day schools, Hebrew immersion and after-school activities. For adults, a wide range of programs promote life-long learning. Special programs are dedicated to immigrants, to people with disabilities, and to seniors.

And yet, for all there is, it is simply not enough. The community wants more. More schools with more places to accommodate the growing number of children whose parents want them to have a Jewish education.

I believe that our commitment to quality education will ensure the future of our Jewish community.
Dale Lastman

I believe that our community must rise to the challenge of change — economic, political, and societal. We have to think differently, respond differently, act differently.
Elaine Todres

UNITY

I believe that our principles, our rights, and our freedom are protected through the force of this community's collective voice — and action.

CAROLE STERLING

I believe that a cornerstone of this community is our shared culture — Jewish music, dance, theatre, literature, art. It all adds up to a celebration of who we are.

GERALD SCHWARTZ

ADVOCACY: WE MUST STAND UP

The strength of our community and the safety and security of our individual lives are determined, in large part, by the power of our collective voice.

Injustice. Inequity. Immorality. We must be vigilant in speaking out against what's wrong. And speaking up for what's right. On our own behalf and on behalf of other minorities. To do otherwise is to neglect our responsibilities as Jews and as a Jewish community.

Our community is consistently vocal on the political, humanitarian, and social justice issues that affect Jews and Canadian society as a whole. Against anti-Semitism and all other forms of racism. For human rights. For freedom from repression for Jews in Arab and Moslem countries. For the prosecution of Nazi war criminals.

CULTURE: OUR STORY SURVIVES

Culture works. It gives expression, form and meaning to our hopes and dreams, our thoughts and fears. It explains us to ourselves, and to others. It establishes common bonds and captures our collective imagination.

Jewish culture, so central to Jewish life, is integral to our community centres and programs. At summer camps and in youth groups. In festivals to celebrate Jewish film, literature, music and dance. In exhibitions of Jewish art and lectures by Jewish thinkers.

Our daily lives are filled with details of our culture and history. A Hebrew song about hope. The story of Moses or the Holocaust. A photograph of the Negev sands, the joy and sorrow of the Western Wall. The sweetness of apples and honey. The comfort of chicken soup. A child's draidle...

Our hearts are in these details. Our lives are in the continuing tale.

WELL-BEING: HUMAN NEEDS GROW

As a community, we give comfort to the vulnerable. Help to the needy. Hope to the less fortunate. Here, at home. In Israel. Wherever Jews are in need.

Our willingness to respond to others' needs is reflected in the number and variety of institutions and initiatives addressing pressing problems. We provide kosher food for homebound seniors, counselling for Jewish youth and their families, funds for the economically disadvantaged, language training and employment assistance for immigrants, and care for children at risk in Israel.

But serving those in difficult straits is only half the story. A relentless need also exists for services that bring and keep the community together, such as social programming for older people, recreational opportunities for youth, singles programs, and missions to Israel.

Despite all the services we have in place, the demand for them cannot be met. The infrastructure of our social programs is bursting at the seams. More and better facilities are needed. Now.

Our VALUES in ACTI

UJA Federation is charged with a vital mission: to preserve and enrich Jewish life in the Greater Toronto Area, and to perpetuate our community's identification with Israel. In other words, to translate our values into effective, collective action.

I believe the results we need come from the institutions that serve the special needs of our community — particularly in the areas of healthcare and education.
LAWRENCE TANENBAUM

I believe that the quality of our care for the vulnerable is a measure of our success as a Jewish community.
LORRAINE SANDLER

Over the past 80 years, UJA Federation has played a central role in building one of the world's strongest Jewish communities. Today is no different. UJA Federation is pivotal to achieving meaningful results. Results that reflect what we value. As Jews. As a Jewish community.

MORE KNOWLEDGE Our children must have access to a Jewish education. UJA Federation ensures they do. Subsidies are provided through the Board of Jewish Education for parents who can't afford full day-school tuition fees.

Toronto's 21 day schools and 40 supplementary schools enable over 16,000 children to start their education in a Jewish environment. Ninety per cent of our community's children receive some form of Jewish education. The result: a deeper Jewish identity and greater pride in our heritage.

MORE JUSTICE Freedom. Tolerance. Equity. These are principles of Jewish life. UJA Federation funds Canadian Jewish Congress to undertake advocacy on many public and social justice causes: Initiatives to promote government financial support for day schools. Relentless vigilance in the fight against anti-Semitism. And cooperation with other ethnic and religious communities on common causes.

ON

A strong voice is our best defence against threats to our security and our most effective tool in protecting the rights of Jews here, and everywhere.

MORE COMPASSION For too many in our community, these are tough times. One in seven Toronto Jews lives in poverty. Jewish immigrants arrive here without language skills, a place to live, or employment opportunities. Jewish young people are dealing with a whole range of unprecedented problems. Among our seniors, quality of life is often jeopardized by the absence of simple, human contact.

UJA Federation must continue to play the leadership role in meeting these multiplying needs, through support for essential human services. And, most important, by identifying community service priorities and allocating resources to them.

STRONGER FAMILIES The family is the building block of a strong Jewish community. In Toronto, our family structures are under stress. More divorce. More children living in single-parent homes. More economic pressures as a result. And our youth, struggling to find themselves, are too often plagued by substance abuse and emotional trauma.

UJA Federation works to promote stronger Jewish families. Jewish Campus Services and The Young Leadership Cabinet of UJA enable young adults to maintain strong ties with their peers. Jewish Family and Child Service ensures that families have access to the counselling they need, and youth have services and programs to help them get through troubled times.

URGENT RESCUE Every year, tens of thousands of Jews in distress are rescued and resettled in Israel. But freedom from danger and instability does not come without staggering costs. Housing, employment, social services, and education are needed to help immigrants build new lives.

UJA Federation enables the Jewish Agency for Israel to provide these essential services. UJA Federation missions to Israel offer Toronto Jews firsthand knowledge of the country's daily challenges — and of the heroic success Israel has achieved in meeting them.

MORE TZEDAKAH There is a bottom line to building our community. It takes money to support it. Toronto's UJA is recognized as one of the most effective and efficient fundraising organizations anywhere. Our community's quality of life is internationally admired.

The measure of our success in the years ahead will be the extent to which we believe in our community, in each other, through our support of UJA Federation.

I believe that our community promotes Jewish continuity. At home, we strengthen our identity through education. Abroad, we help rescue Jews who are not free to practise their faith.

JACK CARR

I believe that the fate of Israel and the fate of our community are inextricably linked. Our Jewish community is integral to building a stronger Israel, for today, for tomorrow, for always.

A new beginning

Father and daughter tightly embrace, their souls almost visibly enfolding into each other. Surrounded by a corona of heaven's deepest blue, Victor Tzadekov hugs his young daughter Lena. They are from Chechnya.

At the height of the Chechen war against Russia, during which more than 80,000 people were killed, Tzadekov sent his wife and two children to safety in Israel. But he was left behind, unable to get out of Grozny to rejoin them, assumed by a frightened and grieving family to have been lost forever.

The photo above captures the sweet, poignant pleasure of their reunion in Mitzpeh Ramon, Israel, after a separation of nearly six months. The power of the photograph has a special meaning at this time of the year.

The imagery of Rosh Hashanah is predominantly sombre. We think of soul-searching and introspection, of repentance and resolve, of the entire world, as it were, passing like an obedient flock before the shepherd, before God's judgment. In our hearts and through our prayers, we ask for a just and merciful inscription for the coming year.

But we sometimes lose sight of the fact that the holiday, in its rich, mimetic symbolism and in its thoughtful homiletics, is also very child-oriented.

Editorial

At home we eat a variety of sweet foods, which most children tend to enjoy, as an unsubtle statement of hope for the upcoming year.

In synagogue, we read from the Torah and from the prophets, four other connected statements of hope, all inspired by children. On the first day of Rosh Hashanah, the Torah reading deals with the birth of Yitzhak. It was on Rosh Hashanah, we believe, that God made the promise of Yitzhak's birth to Sarah, his mother.

In thematic tandem with the Torah portion, the Haftorah relates the heart-rending story of Hannah who ached for and cried a painful, desolate prayer to have a child. Her prayer was ultimately answered.

The Torah reading for the second day of the holiday tells of Akedat Yitzhak, the binding of Isaac as a sacrifice to God. The Haftorah describes Rachel's inconsolable lament for the exile of her children.

Our sages believed that after the destruction of the Temple and the dispersion of Israel from its land, the Shehinah, the Divine Essence, did not go into exile with the great

L'Shanah Tovah 5757

L' Shanah Tovah

Rosh Hashanah greetings

Message from the president of the State of Israel Mr. Ezer Weizman

During the past year the Nation of Israel has experienced monumental tragedy, historic changes and significant growth.

On Rosh Hashanah, we pray for a better year to come, for peace and well-being and for the values we wish to see come true. Let us learn from the past and look ahead to a better future.

The State of Israel remains committed to securing peace with our neighbors, while maintaining security for all our citizens.

We will overcome the obstacles and create a sturdy society. In order to do so, we must dedicate ourselves to healing the rift within ourselves, to strengthening our nationhood and unity. The differences between us must never erupt in a self-destructive manner. Dialogue, compromise and fraternity must rule our behavior.

In educating our Jewish youth here and abroad, we must redouble our efforts to instil the sense of peoplehood and unity, while at the same time, inspiring our children with our rich and loving traditions, language and culture. Too many of our youth suffer from educational malnutrition and from apathy.

Israel must become a magnet drawing Jewish youth and Jewish families from all over the world, from distressed and underprivileged countries as well as from Western ones. The Hebrew language must become the symbol of our culture and a unifying force.

Ezer Weizman

Let us work towards that future in this year 5757 and in it may we see the fulfilment of our personal and national aspirations.

Message from the prime minister of the State of Israel Mr. Benjamin Netanyahu

With the approach of Rosh Hashanah 5757, I would like to wish you and your loved ones a happy and healthy New Year.

The Days of Awe have traditionally been a time of introspection and soul-searching, when we gaze back even as we eagerly anticipate the future. In this spirit, I would like to share with you my thoughts on Israel and the Jewish people.

First, we must bring security and peace; the two are inseparable. Peace with security means restoring hope and optimism to our nation and removing the burden of war and terror. Recent years have been filled with unprecedented acts of brutality and violence directed against innocent Israeli civilians. These are incompatible with the paece process.

As we pursue contacts with our neighbors, we shall act to preserve the nation's vital interests. Jerusalem, our eternal capital, shall remain undivided under Israeli sovereignty. In the coming year, we will celebrate the 30th anniversary of our reunification with the walls, the alleyways and ramparts of our beloved Jerusalem. It is from Jerusalem, the object of our people's longings and tears over the millenia, that we derive our strength of purpose and national fortitude.

A strong and secure Israel also requires a free and vibrant economy. Embarking upon a program of privatization will free Israel's entrepreneurial spirit from the stifling shackles of overregulation and government interference. A more competitive and efficient economy will enable Israel to flourish in the increasingly competitive global market place. Opening up the Israeli economy will not be easy, but the benefits will be vast.

One of the engines of our economic and national revival is the continued arrival of tens of thousands of new immigrants each year. This historic return to our homeland is the fulfilment of the age-old visions of the prophets of Israel and the realization of Zionism. The Jewish people are coming home, bringing with them vitality and creativity.

Yet even as we celebrate Israel's continued growth, we must view with alarm the trends in Jewish communities worldwide. The plague of assimilation and ignorance is wreaking havoc upon our people, snatching our finest and brightest youth. The "People of the Book" are in danger of becoming the "People Who Do Not Read the Book."

Benjamin Netanyahu

At this hallowed time of the year, it becomes especially clear that the surest guarantee of our future lies in understanding and cherishing our heritage. We need to intensify and expand Jewish education. We give our youth the tools to be productive members of society, but we must also give them the tools to be proud and faithful Jews. We Israelis are committed to working with you in the Diaspora. Together, we can overcome the dire threat posed to our people's continuity.

Wishing you a Shanah Tovah, and a year of blessings and peace.

Netanyahu-Arafat meeting marks turning point

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – On the face of it, the long-awaited, painfully orchestrated Netanyahu-Arafat meeting that took place last week produced little of substance.

Analysis

Nevertheless, it would be very wrong – and certainly premature – to write off this meeting as unimportant. This was a diplomatic encounter of the kind where the fact that it took place at all is much more significant than any specific items that were discussed.

Both diplomatically and domestically, this meeting may prove in the not too distant future to have been a Rubicon for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu – a line that once crossed, cannot be crossed back.

After talking for a little over an hour, Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority head Yasser Arafat told waiting reporters that the many issues on the agenda between them would be taken up by various joint committees.

There was no specific word about the delayed redeployment of Israeli troops from most of the West Bank town of Hebron. Nor was there any news about prisoner releases or about easing the closure Israel imposed on the territories earlier this year.

"We have to take into account the needs and requirements of both sides on the basis of reciprocity and assurance of the security and well-being of both Israelis and Palestinians alike," Netanyahu said at a joint news conference after the meeting.

"I want to repeat here once again our commitment to security cooperation with Israel and our commitment to cooperate with Israel in all aspects in accordance with the agreement signed," Arafat said.

The meeting at the Erez Crossing, which marks the border between Israel and the autonomous Gaza Strip, involved none of the hugging and hand-shaking that characterized the Palestinian leader's meetings with Shimon Peres when he was foreign minister and then prime minister.

And it was even less warm than the more reserved meetings Arafat had with Yitzhak Rabin.

The most the Likud prime minister could do, it seemed, was to provide the photographers with a perfunctory handshake. There were few smiles or other gestures between the two leaders. But since Netanyahu, as recently as February, pledged not to meet with Arafat, something of major political importance transpired last week.

And an additional reflection of the significance of the meeting is that it was largely arranged by Terje Larsen, the Norwegian diplomat who was instrumental in brokering the initial Oslo contacts between the previous Labor government and the Palestine Liberation Organization in 1993.

Now head of the U.N. mission in Gaza, Larsen helped orchestrate days of marathon sessions between the Israeli and Palestinians officials who worked out the preliminaries for the summit. He also shuttled between the offices of Netanyahu and Arafat, ultimately securing their agreement to meet.

Larsen announced last Wednesday that the joint Israeli-Palestinian steering committee – which oversees implementation of the self-rule accords – would convene Thursday to begin dealing with the issues separating the two sides.

In Washington, President Bill Clinton welcomed the meeting. "It reflects their continuing commitment to resolving their differences through negotiations and to securing a lasting peace," he said.

On the Israeli political front, the fact that key figures in the Likud and its coalition partners were blasting their leader's "betrayal" at the very moment that the meeting was taking place exemplifies the domestic political complexity of the move Netanyahu has made.

Science Minister Ze'ev "Benny" Begin, who is opposed to the self-rule accords, said Netanyahu was capitulating to blackmail and was acting in violation of the government's basic policy guidelines.

Uzi Landau, the Likud chair of the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee, accused Netanyahu of abandoning all his campaign promises. Knesset member Rehavam Ze'evi of the right-wing Moledet party said Netanyahu had agreed to the meeting so that he could "bring something sweet" to talks scheduled with Clinton this week in Washington.

Netanyahu, who had said he would meet Arafat only if he deemed it in the national interest, justified his actions.

"I said that when I feel it is appropriate to meet with Arafat, I will," he said at a Tel Aviv news conference. "I know this will be a difficult process," he added, "but I know where we are going. I have a plan, a compass. Sometimes you have to move a little to the right, to the left, but I know where we are going."

He announced that Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai would meet with Arafat to continue discussions.

Celebrating Rosh Hashanah in Kiryat Shmonah

It was a smaller community then, approximately 15,000 people, and like most communities in Israel, a melange of cultures and customs. The main admixtures were Moroccan and Romanian, an unlikely combination anywhere else on earth. But in Israel, in Kiryat Shmonah in 1971, it was beautiful and it made sense.

Kiryat Shmonah is the northernmost city in Israel. It sits like a tiny starling in an open-air nest, contented but exposed, on the western edge of the Hula Valley between the hills of Lebanon and the heights of the Golan. Because it was mid September, the heat of the day, even at its hottest, was pleasant.

The bus station was near the end of town heading north on the main road toward Metulla. It was a busy place that day. People were leaving the city ahead of sundown to celebrate Rosh Hashanah with extended families or friends in other parts of the country. Most of the 125 North American students studying that summer in the Jewish Agency's ulpan dormitory in the heart of the city had already left for more southerly destinations.

One of those students, however, was at the bus station to greet a traveller rather than to become one. He was waiting for his friend to arrive from Jerusalem.

The bus pulled into the Jerusalem bay in the bus station. Three people stepped down. She was the third. His heart soared higher than the heights in the northern sky when he saw her. A bottle of grapefruit juice he gave her to slake a dusty thirst. The flowers were a graceful compensation for what he knew would be a clumsy, self-conscious greeting.

That evening, they were guests at the home of Saadia Levy and his family. Saadia was the caretaker at the dormitory. Taking care of a school in which 125 North American university graduates lived meant that Saadia always had a lot to do. He was a short, stocky man in his early 60s, with a full head of curly brown hair. He wore glasses in which the lenses were so thick it made his eyes appear as small brown peas. But his smile was a rich and wonderful thing to see, his teeth shining in perfect whiteness and symmetry.

Saadia came to Israel from Spanish-speaking Morocco. Three of his six children were born in Kiryat Shmonah. He was a gentle, patient man who always extended himself for the students at the ulpan. His name in Hebrew meant God's helper. In this man, it was so true.

The two student guests were seated to Saadia's immediate right at the table which had been specially elongated to accommodate the children, daughters- and sons-in-law, grandchildren and, of course, the two guests. Saadia's oldest son sat to the right of the guests.

No celebration in which the students had ever participated back home in North America prepared them for what they were about to experience that happy, loving, noisy, Rosh Hashanah evening in the home of Saadia Levy in Kiryat Shmonah.

Never in their lives had they been served so much food, in such varieties, so delicious, so interesting and so colorful. At the outset of the meal, a bottle of very sweet, sacramental Carmel wine and a twisted challah were placed in front of each of the students.

Saadia always received the first portion of each course. But he only nibbled at his food. He was almost entirely focused on ensuring that his company had enough to eat. In that regard, he competed with his wife. The two students were served next, after Saadia. In fact, no one else received any food until the students had finished at least half of their current serving. Not counting the numerous salads on the table, they ate their way through 11 different courses.

At the end of the evening, the two students returned to the dorms. Due to the amount of food they had consumed, the walk home was difficult. But it was mostly downhill and under the canopy of a million stars. As they walked, they felt tremendous gratitude for the generosity of God's helper and for the magical way in which the new year had begun.

Report criticizes 'inordinate delay' in war crimes cases

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A senior Justice Department official made an error in judgment when he met a Federal Court judge to to discuss three war crimes cases, but he was motivated by concerns over "inordinate delays" in the proceedings, a report released last week concludes.

As a result of the March 1 meeting between Ted Thompson, assistant deputy attorney general for civil litigation, and Federal Court chief judge Julius Isaac, there is now a public perception of misconduct. In addition, Thompson has lost the confidence of his colleagues and he should be reassigned to new duties in the Justice Department, states Charles Dubin, former chief justice of the Ontario Court of Appeal.

In a 45-page report prepared for the Justice Department, Dubin concluded that Thompson never attempted to influence the outcome of the cases.

"Thompson wanted to draw the attention of the chief justice to the department's proposal for a reference [to the Supreme Court on legal issues], the problems the Department of Justice was having with respect to the progress of the cases which were then pending in the Federal Court and the impact of the delay on revocation proceedings yet to be instituted," Dubin wrote.

However, Thompson crossed "a fine line between the administrative and adjudicative functions of a court or a judge."

He said it was inappropriate for Thompson to discuss the three cases with Isaac, though it would not have been inappropriate behavior to bring the department's concerns over scheduling future cases to Isaac's attention.

Lawyers for the three alleged war criminals seized on the meeting to request a stay of proceedings in the cases. They argued that the meeting was so egregious that it cast doubt on the principle of judicial independence. Federal Court Judge Bud Cullen accepted the proposition and ordered the proceedings halted. The federal government is appealing the decision.

In analysing the background to the March 1 meeting, Dubin noted that the three men — Helmut Oberlander, Erichs Tobiass and Johann Dueck — were accused of concealing their wartime activites, including the execution of civilians.

In January 1995, federal authorities began proceedings to strip them of their citizenship as a prelude to deportation. But "over a period of 13 months, only one day had been allocated to hear argument and that has permitted only a portion of the argument to be heard on one of three motions pending, all of which were preliminary in nature and preliminary to the revocation proceedings themselves," Dubin wrote.

"The end of the motions, let alone the applications for revocation [of citizenship] was nowhere in sight," he said.

Dubin noted that "in cases such as these, delay is welcomed by the [alleged war criminals] who do not want to lose their Canadian citizenship and be deported. It is quite understandable that the proceedings would be vigorously resisted by counsel for the [three men]."

Examining the impact of the delays, Dubin points out "the three revocation cases pending in the Federal Court were to be followed by several others and the slow progress of the three pending cases was having a direct adverse impact on them.

"There is a societal interest that proceedings once commenced proceed expeditiously. By reason of their very nature, that is particularly so in these cases. If matters are complex, more time must be assigned for argument," Dubin wrote.

Dubin's report was welcomed by Canadian Jewish Congress, which, along with other Jewish groups, has consistently criticized federal authorities and, more recently, the courts for the slow proceedings in the cases.

"Dubin concludes that the government initially acted with sensitivity towards inordinate delays on these cases," Keith Landy, Congress' honorary legal counsel, pointed out.

Bernie Farber, Congress' national director of community relations, said Dubin and Cullen exhibited a tremendous difference in attitude to the pace of proceedings in the cases. What Dubin saw as "inordinate delays," Cullen saw as normal, Farber said.

"Dubin's report confirms what we've been saying about the way the Federal Court is proceeding. He used stronger language than we do," Farber said.

Many challenges await in 5757

Rosh Hashanah message from Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Goldie Hershon

Goldie Hershon

As we look towards the New Year 5757, many challenges appear on the Jewish agenda: the fight against anti-Semitism and racism nationally and abroad; the prosecution, denaturalization and deportation of suspected Nazi war criminals still resident in Canada; the promotion of national unity; advocacy on key national social policy and equity issues; Jewish continuity; and, of course, support for the state and people of Israel.

Among these issues, most are common to Diaspora communities. But one is not. The issue of Quebec separation and Canadian unity is preoccupying Canadians these days and the organized Jewish community is no different, particularly in Quebec where CJC's national headquarters are located.

The referendum on sovereignty last fall was too close for comfort and the narrow margin of victory means that we must overcome any sense of fatigue and renew our efforts to fight for national unity. To support national unity we must speak repeatedly about the benefits of being Canadian. Canada is one of the greatest countries in the world. Unfortunately, separatists would choose to divide our nation. As Jews, we benefit from a strong Canada.

Meanwhile, the fight against anti-Semitism and racism remains a human rights issue. From groups like the Heritage Front to neo-Nazis in our own Canadian military, these remain sources of concern. While hate is spread in many different ways, we now must pay close attention to the Internet and the likes of Ernst Zundel polluting cyberspace with his views. The pursuit of suspected Nazi war criminals in our country is not getting any easier. Time continues to run out and our judicial system has proven to be a serious deterrent, letting men with blood on their hands free in some cases because of procedural issues. We can't let up the pressure on our federal government.

In the Middle East, we pray that the search for peace will continue, allowing Israel to flourish in an atmosphere of harmony and shalom. May the Jewish homeland grow from strength to strength.

It is not our role to advise the Israeli government how to conduct its affairs. While we support peace, it is clear the Israeli government, like any other in the world, has as its first responsibility the protection of the lives of its citizens, its way of life and its territorial integrity.

As we go to synagogue during the High Holy Days, let us all pray for a year of goodwill and coalition building between communities. We must all work together in making this a better world in which to live.

I wish you all a very Happy New Year.

Message from the chargé d'affaires of the Embassy of Israel Mr. Chen Ivri

Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are two of the most important holidays of our people. These are days of spiritual elation, days of examination of our conscience and days of soul searching. During the 10 days between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, the most solemn days of our tradition, our soul searching acquires a sublime value. We rigorously examine our conscience, our acts and our conduct.

On the eve of the New Year, we once again reflect upon our lives. We look to where we have been, we look also to where we had hoped to be. This is as true for nations as it is for individuals.

Year in, year out, through celebration and crises, the bond between our two nations becomes ever stronger, symbolizing despite vast distances of geography an unseverable union of purpose and history of common cause.

That bond and its immeasurable strength, are exemplified in the relations between our two communities. We are deeply grateful to you for your help, support and understanding which have been your constant hallmark.

As we approach the eve of the New Year full of hope, daring to dream of possibilities which only months ago were remote and distant aspirations, resolved to act in every manner reasonable and responsible to try to make those possibilities come alive, we are thankful for the kinship which we share with the Jewish communities around the world.

On behalf of the government of Israel, its people, and my family, I extend wishes for health, happiness, fulfilment, rewarding life and the answer to our prayers — peace. Shanah Tovah.

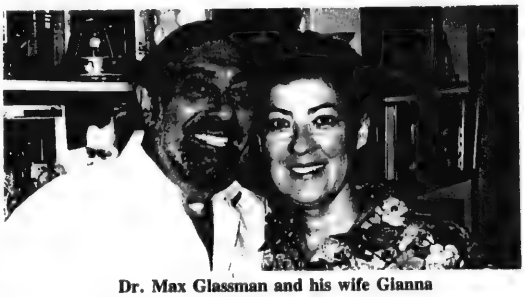
Bloor JCC gets $750,000 gift

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter



Dr. Max Glassman and his wife Gianna

TORONTO — The Bloor Jewish Community Centre (Bloor JCC) last week announced that a major step has been taken towards its future financial health.

The downtown centre received a pledge for $750,000 from one of its longtime members, Dr. Max Glassman, and will name the facility after him and his family.

The $750,000 contribution goes a long way towards meeting the Bloor JCC's $5-million fundraising goal. Together with other pledges and $750,000 from the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, the Bloor JCC has accumulated almost $3 million in pledges since it became an independent entity in May 1995, said Bill Emery, the Bloor JCC's executive-director.

A former branch of the Jewish Community Centre (JCC), the Bloor JCC had for years faced the prospect of being sold to meet the JCC's enormous financial obligations, which on its dissolution reached about $15 million.

As part of the bail-out of the JCC by the federation (the federation paid all the JCC's creditors), the Bloor JCC became an independent body controlled by a members' group. It assumed a $3-million mortgage owing to the Bank of Montreal as its part of the JCC's debt. The federation provided $750,000 over three years to help pay down the mortgage interest.

Meanwhile, the members group launched an ambitious fundraising campaign aimed at raising $3 million to pay off the bank debt, $1 million for renovations and a further $1 million to operate programs and for other contingencies.

Funds received pursuant to the pledges (cheques have already been received) go first to paying down the centre's bank debt. Since it became independent in May '95, the Bloor JCC has paid off $300,000 in interest and whittled down the principal by a further $300,000, Emery added.

The mortgage should be down to $1.5 million in about a year-and-a-half, making it payable out of operating funds. At that point, renovations to the building should begin and be completed in three to six months, he said.

"We're amazed and thrilled by the support we're getting around here. When you ask people, they have been extremely supportive and generous," he said.

The centre has received quite a few $5,000 donations as well as several for $50,000 — not all from current Bloor JCC members, he added.

A former air force pilot, Glassman has been a member of the Bloor JCC and its predecessor, the YMHA, on and off since 1937.

"I'm privileged and blessed by God to be in a position both financially and psychologically to be able to support an organization, both for the Jewish and the general community, that has such a positive impact from early childhood until the later golden years," he said.

"I believe the Bloor JCC is deserving of tremendous commendation, particularly in bringing a great deal of goodwill to the Jewish community from the general community," he added.

For Glassman, founder of the Queensway Medical Centre, the Bloor JCC is a family facility. He works out at the centre four times a week, running on the track or treadmill, lifting weights and enjoying a sauna. He's also a regular worshipper at the centre's chapel.

His wife, Gianna, has been a member for about 13 years. Their daughters, Jordana Glassman and Shoshana Weiman, also work out at the centre.

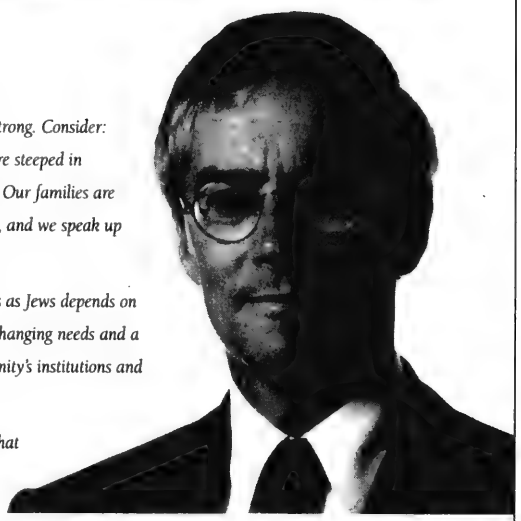
Our children are steeped in Jewish education — 90 per cent receive some kind of Jewish learning. Our families are generally more stable than others. We speak out against what's wrong, and we speak up for what's right. And, our desire for community endures.*

But we cannot take what we have for granted. The quality of our lives as Jews depends on the strength of our institutions. And today, that quality is imperiled. Changing needs and a growing range of demands are challenging the capacity of our community's institutions and services to respond.

I believe that UJA Federation is the most efficient means of ensuring that what we value — as a Jewish community — is translated into effective action. Now. And always.



Lawrence Bloomberg

By funding our community's institutions, UJA Federation enriches Jewish life. By providing help and hope to those in need. By ensuring that no child is denied a Jewish education. By providing the means for us to speak out on the critical issues that affect Jews here, and abroad.

But for all we have, it cannot meet demand. Resources can only come from one place: our community — each and every one of us.

FOR OUR COMMUNITY. FOR ISRAEL.
FOR OUR CHILDREN. FOREVER.

Tuition fees up at most day schools

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For kids, it's time for new notebooks and pencils, but parents of the more than 10,000 students in Toronto's Jewish day school system may be reaching for the aspirin around now.

That's because tuition fees at most of the community-funded schools are up, but the increases are described as in line with rises in inflation and cost of living.

Just three of the 13 schools under the Toronto Board of Jewish Education (BJE) are reporting no tuition increase over last year.

Here's how things break down:

- At Associated Hebrew Day Schools, tuition per child has gone from $6,550 last year to $6,950, a rise of 6.1 percent.
- At Beth Jacob High School for Girls, fees are now $9,575 per child, from $8,975 last year, up 6.7 percent.
- Tuition at Bialik Hebrew Day School has gone from $7,100 to $7,250, a rise of two percent.
- Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) has seen the sharpest rise, along with Beth Jacob High School. Fees are up 6.7 percent, from $8,975 a year ago to $9,575 per student.
- Eitz Chaim Day School's tuition has risen from $6,650 to $6,900, an increase of nearly 3.8 percent.
- There has been no increase at Leo Baeck Day School. This year's tuition is $7,600 per child.
- There has also been no increase at Ner Israel Yeshiva. Averaged out among all grades, including room and board, fees stay in the $11,500 range.
- The smallest increase has been at Netivot Hatorah, where tuition has gone from $7,350 to $7,400, up less than one percent.
- Or Haemet has seen no rise. Tuition stays at $6,150 per child.
- Fees at She'arim Hebrew Day School for the learning disabled have gone up from $11,350 per child to $11,750, a 3.5 percent increase.
- Also up sharply is tuition at Ulpanat Orot Girls' School, from $9,675 to $10,275 per child, a 6.2 percent rise.
- Fees at United Synagogue Day Schools are up nearly three percent, from $6,900 to $7,100 per child.
- Tuition at Yeshiva B'nai Akiva Or Chaim has risen by 6.2 percent, from $9,675 to $10,275.

The average increase across the system is 3.5 percent.

"That's not out of the ordinary," remarked Bernard Shoub, director of school finances at the BJE, in comparing this year's round of increases with those in previous years.

Shoub said a "key factor" in an analysis of tuition will be how costs break down between those who pay full fees versus those parents who receive financial assistance from the community. The figures for this academic year won't be out for a few months.

Last year, the numbers told two stories. The percentage of students receiving financial assistance was down for the fourth straight year, but the actual number getting subsidies was up. That was because there were more students in the system.

In the 1995-'96 academic year, 41 percent of BJE-funded day school students — or about 2,800 kids — received subsidies, ranging from full assistance to a few hundred dollars.

Shoub said subsidies also vary from school to school. At some, just 10 percent of students receive aid, while at others, the ratio can get as high as 85 percent.

There are many complex factors behind tuition increases, Shoub said.

Student population continues to increase

One is class size and the distribution of students. If a school has a cutoff of say, 25 children per class, and a certain grade grows to 51 students, then the class size grows from two classes of 25 students to three classes of 17 students. So while the Jewish student population continues to increase, especially in the suburbs, how students are spread out can often translate into higher costs.

Another factor is the mix of teachers. Junior teachers earn less than those with seniority. But, Shoub said, teachers' salaries have not increased dramatically over the years.

Other factors, Shoub noted, include leftover strains from the recession, ongoing government cutbacks and depressed fundraising in the community generally.

Consul General Kinar completes first year

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — So far, after one year in Canada, Jehudi Kinar has experienced nothing to compare with the shock of having a German ex-SS man come up to him and ask for forgiveness.

Sure, there have been anti-Semites who have called open line radio shows and spouted anti-Jewish propaganda, and there's been frustration at a major Toronto newspaper's coverage of the Middle East, but overall, Kinar is pleased with the way his first year in Canada has gone.

For Kinar, serving as consul general for Ontario and the West was a stroke of good fortune. "I always wanted a North American experience and I consider myself lucky," he said, referring to the two years he served in San Francisco before moving to Toronto.

Kinar clearly enjoys the warmth, hospitality and fervently-Zionist atmosphere in Toronto's Jewish community and he endorses the reputation of Toronto in Israel's Foreign Ministry as a strong supporter of the Jewish state regardless of the party in power.

Kinar jokes that his posting to Toronto from San Francisco was a natural. After all, the cities follow each other alphabetically and even the telephone area codes run consecutively, with San Fran's 415 followed immediately by Toronto's 416.

All joking aside, Kinar said he is happy to remain in North America after two previous postings to Holland and West Germany.

So far in his first year in Canada, Kinar has seen more of the country than most longtime citizens. He's visited Vancouver twice, and seen Edmonton, Calgary, Regina, Saskatoon and Winnipeg.

He has met with the local Jewish communities and political leaders, discussed the Middle East with newspaper editorial boards and representatives of the electronic media and attempted to cultivate interest in Israel among Canadian businesspeople.

One of his pet projects is to showcase the non-political, non-military side of Israel by bringing cultural ambassadors of the Jewish state — musicians, authors and artists — so that Canadians will see Israel's human face.

Kinar has also dived headlong into community life. One of the first programs he attended as representative of the Jewish state was the memorial to slain Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. He's also been invited to three Yom Hashoah commemorations, prompting him to suggest the consolidation of the services into one large community event.

And he's willing to drop diplomatic niceties when it comes to tackling Israel's strongest critics, in particular, the Toronto Star.

Shunning diplomatic language, Kinar said "the Toronto Star is an example of a paper that lost its perspective when a new [Likud] government was elected ... They are frustrated that the Israeli public didn't take their advice" by re-electing the Labor government of Shimon Peres, he said.

Other papers level criticism at Israel, but the Star is more critical of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu than of Yasser Arafat and Hafez al-Assad, he suggested.

Newspapers should not withhold criticism, but "it should not all be one-sided," he added.

Thankfully, Kinar said, the Star's attitude is not duplicated in other newspapers and the electronic media show balance when reporting on the Middle East.

Speaking of his former posting, Kinar said he believes San Francisco bears some similarities, and many differences, to Toronto.

While both communities are about the same size, the Jews of San Francisco are much more assimilated than those of Toronto. The Jewish education system here is much more extensive and widely used. Attachment to Israel is stronger in Canada and there is a larger Orthodox community and more Holocaust survivors here as well, he said.

Jehudi Kinar

Holland and Germany are two different kettle of fish. From 1976 to '81 Kinar served in the Hague and from 1983 to '88 he worked in Bonn.

It was while living in Germany and attending an "Israel Day" event hosted by the town of Laupheim, near the Swiss border, that his encounter with an ex-Nazi took place. After Kinar had addressed the crowd and discussed Israel, a man approached him and said, " 'You are the first Jew and Israeli I have met since the war. I was an SS officer and I want to apologize.' "

Taken aback, Kinar could do nothing else but shake the hand that was offered him, but he declined the SS man's request to be forgiven.

"It's not for me to forgive," Kinar told him.

Though Kinar is a representative of the Jewish State, he also had a personal stake in the SS man's request. Born in the early part of the war, Kinar was 16 months old when his parents hid him with a Dutch woman.

Although he has almost no memory of those early years, Kinar recalls being reunited with his parents and sister at age 5, after they'd survived Bergen-Belsen.

One of his first memories dates back to 1948 when Israel declared its independence and crowds of Jews flocked to the Amsterdam concert hall to dance horahs in celebration.

Even then, at age 7, Kinar felt that Israel was the place for him.

Raised in a modern Orthodox home that was fervently Zionist, Kinar later attended university in Geneva, Switzerland, studying to be an interpreter. He went on to complete a masters degree in political science and authored a thesis in 1968 on Israel's technical assistance to African countries.

In Geneva, the former Bnei Akiva activist chaired the Jewish Students Union and met many Israelis through the World Union of Jewish Students.

In 1969, he made aliyah, joining his many aunts and uncles who had fled Germany before the war. Five days after he arrived in Israel, he met his future wife, Ruti.

Kinar joined the Foreign Ministry in January 1970 but left after two years to join an investment company. Two years later, he rejoined the ministry, this time to stay.

Over the course of years, he's served in a variety of capacities, including in the department of international cooperation and as a deputy director of information.

When asked to serve in Germany — he speaks fluent German — he hesitated at first. How would he react when he met people in their 60s and 70s who were adults during the war, he wondered.

Now, looking back on his Germany experience, he calls it "very interesting."

He took the opportunity to discuss Israel and the Holocaust with young Germans. He found the generation whose grandparents were adults during the war receptive to hearing Kinar's description of the Jews' experience of the war and to questioning their grandparents, he said.

Still, old attitudes die hard. Kinar recalls one jarring experience for his wife, who was talking to a friend in Hebrew when a shopkeeper asked what language they were speaking.

When she replied "Hebrew," the shopkeeper said, "But you look so normal."

At the state level, his tenure in Germany was anything but uneventful. Trade ties increased and a number of firsts were recorded: the visit by then prime minister Shimon Peres to Germany; the visit by then president Chaim Herzog to Germany; the visit by the German president to Israel; and the visit to Israel by German Chancellor Helmut Kohl.

As for his first year in Toronto, Kinar can't point to a particular highlight, saying, "It's been a continuous highlight because of what the community is doing in supporting Israel and each other."

Kinar feels he can serve as a unifying link between community groups. "If I can be helpful in bringing them together through Israel, I see that as part of my work."

A wish for all our friends and clients for a very happy and prosperous New Year.

Diplomacy is honorable...

It was inevitable. That it occurred some 80 days after he became prime minister delighted some and dismayed others. But the first handshake between Benjamin Netanyahu and Yasser Arafat is now a matter for history.

According to a survey of Israeli public opinion conducted by the Dahaf Institute for Yediot Aharonot, 82 percent of Israelis believe Netanyahu's meeting was "a correct step." Thus, the prime minister was able to ward off criticism of his meeting from both inside and outside his own party, secure in the knowledge that the broad mainstream of Israeli life was behind him as he extended his hand across the table toward the Palestinian leader.

Such unequivocal public backing is crucial. It will enable him to negotiate, to honorably engage in diplomacy with the Palestinian Authority, at his pace and according to his own clearly-stated policy parameters, from a demonstrated position of strength. It will also enable him to resist being tugged and pushed by the extremists within the society for whom any negotiations or diplomacy with the Palestinians is anathema.

Peace has always been one of our people's chief aspirations. Its place is central in the prayers that will emanate from our hearts and form on our lips as we usher in the new year tomorrow. May God crown with success the efforts of Prime Minister Netanyahu on behalf of the people of Israel. And may peace be achieved this year, for all years to come.

...demagoguery is not

Also worthy of our prayers is the preservation of Canada. Resorting once again to his favorite tactic, Premier Lucien Bouchard last week raised the anti-separatist bogeyman of Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, only to shoot him down with a flurry of dissimulations and prevarications. He accused the prime minister of personally attempting to heighten tensions in Quebec through an assortment of tactics which included, among others, "fanning the flames" of partition and sending federal cabinet ministers to Quebec City to "gloat" over job losses. As reported in the press, Bouchard said, "Quebecers are ready to express their opinion on the underhanded manoeuvres of Jean Chrétien...to say what it thinks of the undemocratic antics of the leader of the Liberal party...Let him explain why he no longer believes in democracy." (Our emphasis)

It is an old trick, a time-worn ploy practised by the desperate. But it won't work. As we have written in this space numerous times, Quebec secession means Canada's disintegration. The federal government, provincial governments, municipal governments and every individual who believes in Canada and loves it, have the right, if not the obligation, to oppose that disintegration.

We commend the federal government for learning the lessons of the Oct. 30 referendum, for showing unwavering resolve in the fight for Canada, for not retreating to the sidelines. We especially commend the prime minister for championing a strong, distinct and assertive Quebec within a strong, federated and assertive Canada. To be so vilified and so ruthlessly attacked in the province of his birth must cut a terrible, deep wound. He deserves our support even as Canada deserves our prayers as we greet 5757.

AMERICA, ISRAEL, AND THE FORMER SOVIET UNION
ARE ALL FACING A RISE IN VIOLENCE AND A COLLAPSE IN PIONEER MORALITY AND VALUES!
... WHAT MAKES ISRAEL DIFFERENT IS THAT WE'RE GOING TO HELL IN A...

'Brainless' demolition of Palestinian Centre

The Jerusalem municipality's recent decision to launch a pre-dawn demolition of a recently renovated Palestinian community centre with a children's playground was ill-advised, brainless even, and mean-spirited.

The renovations, which were deemed necessary by Jerusalem municipal inspectors, were funded by the Canadian Embassy, the World Vision Charity and a Swedish church. Jerusalem's Likud mayor, Ehud Olmert, defended the action because the Palestinians lacked the necessary building renovation permit, a permit the Palestinians claimed was submitted but ignored.

This legalistic and unworthy demolition diminished the lofty spirit of Jerusalem's 3,000th anniversary.

'Honorary Aryan' at 1936 Berlin Olympics

In his enlightening article on the Olympic Games in Berlin in 1936, Rabbi Gunther Plaut omitted an essential component: the Reichs-Commissioner for the Olympic Games, Exzellenz Theodor Lewald (August 1860 - April 1947, Berlin).

According to the Nazi laws for the "protection of the German blood and honor" as decreed in September 1935, the Reichs-Commissioner was a "Mischling" of the first degree, since his father, though baptized, was fully Jewish by descent. As well, the Lewald family of East-Prussia was widely renowned: the Reichs-commissioner's paternal aunt was the writer and battler for women's rights, Fanny Lewald (1811-1889).

Adolf Hitler tolerated Theodor Lewald's presidency of the Games and indeed his notable presence, because the International Olympic Committee would have refused permission for the Games' venue in Berlin.

In documentary films of the Olympic Games of 1936, one can witness Adolf Hitler himself striding next to Exzellenz Theodor Lewald, heir to a singular Jewish cultural heritage, across the field to the high podium. There Lewald took his place next to the Führer, Hermann Goering, Paul Joseph Goebbels and the rest of these criminals.

Unlike others of paternal Jewish descent, Theodor Lewald was not persecuted during the years that followed, but he was also not "elevated" to the level of an honorary Aryan. Since Lewald was married to the daughter of a Lutheran bishop, his status was that of living within the bonds of a "privileged mixed marriage" and he was not required to wear the Star of David either.

Calling KZ Bisingen prisoners

The town of Bisingen is planning an exhibition in November about the concentration camp and production of oil during World War II in Bisingen/Baden-Wurttemberg (August 1944 - April 1945).

I am looking for information about former prisoners who were in the KZ Bisingen: number of prisoner, nationality, religion, town and date of birth, profession, date and reason of deportation, stay in KZ (where and how long).

For this exhibition, I am looking for photos (survivors: photo of that time and a present photo), personal documents or memoirs.

Antennae down

In our Sept. 5 issue, we carried a letter on the Kielce pogrom from Hanna Sokolski of the Canadian Polish Congress. The letter appeared to use what we consider to be a classic device in anti-Semitic discourse, namely, to identify someone parenthetically as a Jew who may have changed his name and identity. Unfortunately, our antennae were down and we missed the use of this device.

Though a legitimate case can be made for omitting such a letter, it is useful at times to read.

We think our readers will get the message.

Heine's passport to proper society

J. Freeman (CJN, Aug. 15) says that he does not know whether Heinrich Heine was a Jew and also that Heine said that the Germans would take it out on the Jews.

Heinrich Heine was a Jew who converted to Christianity "without ever ceasing to be a Jew." His original name was Harry Heine, but he usually signed his work H. Heine only.

I do not know whether he predicted that the Germans would one day take it out on the Jews, but I do know that he said: "Christianity is a passport to European Society."

Rosh Hashanah in the Sephardi communities

By SARAH TAIEB-CARLEN

In most Ashkenazi communities, Rosh Hashanah is celebrated with festive meals that include apples dipped in honey. In Sephardi communities, it is celebrated with a meal that is prepared without salt or vinegar. In both, the challah is dipped in honey instead of sprinkled with salt after the Hamotzi.

The Sephardi mother does not remind her family about this culinary symbol, preferring instead to surprise them and thus provoke their questions. The meal includes dishes that are specific to Rosh Hashanah and is preceded by a mini-seder which is explained in the "sheet of honey."

During the mini-seder, certain foods are eaten whose Hebrew names allow puns, such as karet (leek): she ikartu ... may (our enemies) be exterminated; krah (pumpkin): she ikara ... may (the decree of our extermination) be ripped. Or symbolic foods are served, such as pomegranates: symbol of abundance ... may we be as numerous as the seeds of a pomegranate; the head of a fish or a lamb ... she ny'heh barosh ve lo bazanav: may we be at the head and not at the tail.

In some communities, people do not eat hazelnuts, because the numerical value of the Hebrew name egoz is 17, the same as the numerical value of chet, sin.

In Iraq and Yemen, it is the custom to slaughter a lamb to symbolize the sacrifice of Isaac read on Rosh Hashanah.

Rosh Hashanah is a time for internal musing, for introverted thinking, meditation and repentance, all inspired by pachad (fear of G-d) and k'nia (submission (to the will of G-d), since on that day, Yom Hadin, Jews are being judged.

In Morocco, they follow the custom of chatarat nedarim, the cancellation of promises and vows made to family and friends during the year. In symbolic expiation of our sins, men hit children and women on the back with branches of the arava, (willow) and in the synagogues, they do the same with fellow congregants.

Rosh Hashanah falls after the month of Elul, which is called chodesh rachamim, because we believe G-d is near us and is listening to us even more than usual. In Kurdistan, this is the month when community leaders intervene between husbands and wives who are going through difficult times in their marriage, in order to reconcile them. It is a tradition which is strictly followed to this day among Kurdistani Jews, who are known to have a very low rate of divorce.

To ensure that one's "mazal" will not sleep, most Jews do not have their usual afternoon siesta, which, in the hot countries of the Mediterranean is a hard thing to do.

In Jerba, the rabbis, anticipating boredom and impatience during the long services on Rosh Hashanah, remind their congregants on the Shabbat preceding Rosh Hashanah of the passage of the Brit Kehouna, written by the Jerban rabbi, Yacov Cohen. In the "Brit," he explains to those who pray that it is better to pray a little, but with kavanah — with all one's heart and mind — rather than a lot, but mechanically.

The Jerbans read all of the 150 Tehillim (Psalms) twice to get to 300, which is the numerical value of kaparah (atonement). The money the synagogue makes from the auction of honors is used to buy winter clothes for the poor. They auction the privilege of taking the Torah out of the Aron Hakodesh, the seven aliyot, the placing of the rimonim (the decorations) on the handles of the Sefer Torah by the children and the Haftorah.

According to Sephardi tradition, no one tells the tokea (the one who blows the shofar) how many or what kinds of blasts to blow. He is the fifth man to be called to the Torah so that he can sell his aliyah and get the money for reading the Torah and not for blowing the shofar, since this is a privilege for which the tokea does not accept payment.

In Syria, they blow 101 blasts of the shofar instead of the customary 100, because 101 is the numerical value of the name Michael, called Sar Israel, Prince of Israel, as we read in the Book of Daniel (12:1):

"And at that time, shall Michael stand up, the great prince who stands for the children of your people; there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation, and at that time, thy people shall be delivered, everyone shall be found written in the Book."

Thus, as Jews pray in the synagogues of Syria, they offer an additional blast of the shofar, hoping that Michael, their champion and protector, hearing the number of blasts corresponding to the gematria of his name, will listen to them, fight for them and have them included in the Book of Life for the coming year.

Hearing the sound of the shofar, which is the central religious obligation of the holiday of Rosh Hashanah, is depicted in a painting dated between 1450 and 1470. The scene is of a community in northern Italy. The painting is from the Rothschild Miscellany at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem. [Reprinted from The Jewish Calendar 1944]

Opinions

Infighting doesn't solve anything

During the 18 days that I spent in Israel in the second half of August, I noticed changes since my three-month stay there the previous summer.

By Viva Press

In Tel Aviv, I went straight to Kikar Malchei Yisrael, which is now called Kikar Rabin, Rabin Square. The Memorial to Yitzhak Rabin stands in the middle of the sidewalk on Ibn Gvirol Street that converges with three other streets onto the square. Last summer, there was no memorial. Rabin was then campaigning for peace. But now, in the middle of the sidewalk on Ibn Gvirol Street, a poster size picture of Rabin stands behind two glass cases with candles inside.

Fresh flowers surround the site and behind the picture, a silver, spray-painted barrel covered in bullet holes has an Israeli flag projecting out of one aperture. Stickers, posters and slogans cover the cement walls and columns of the buildings with messages of peace, of the martyred and of despair. The most ubiquitous is shalom, chaver, goodbye, friend.

Rabin's assassination highlights the ideological differences among Jews. Jews against Jews has evolved into physical confrontations in the streets of Jerusalem. Haredim want Bar Ilan Street, a main thoroughfare that bisects their neighhborhoods, to be closed on Shabbat. Secular and Masorti groups are strongly opposed to the Shabbat closing.

When I got to Israel, a group of my friends told me that the Haredim not only throw stones but have now resorted to throwing dirty diapers at other Jews for violating the Sabbath laws in their area. I didn't believe them.

It is common knowledge that the Haredim's response to passing traffic on the Shabbat is their urgent and loud chanting of "Shabbos, Shabbos," as they try to repulse motorists. But I question the act of throwing things, whether it be stones or diapers, to hurt a fellow Jew. Isn't it written in the Torah that we should treat others the way we would like to be treated? And so, on my first Shabbat afternoon in Jerusalem, I walked with a friend of mine to Bar Ilan Street.

We got there at 5:10 p.m. There were already about 50 or so Haredim, men and women, boys and girls, lining the street. The occasional car drove past. One or two slogans were shouted out. I thought I was in the wrong place. This was a peaceful demonstration, if a demonstration at all. But as time moved on, more and more people came to the street. My friend told me it was getting closer to the time. Six o'clock is when the action really starts.

And then, at about 5:50 p.m. the first of the left-wing Meretz party convoy of cars appeared. The less Orthodox Jews, especially those affiliated with Meretz, provokingly drove through the haredi neighborhoods on Shabbat honking their horns and waving Israeli flags to rile the Haredim. As the cars slowly moved along the street, the chanting of "Shabbos, Shabbos," increased in volume. I felt as though I was at a sporting event. The response of the screaming horns to the frenzied chantings reminded me of a game at the Sky Dome or Maple Leaf Gardens when the fans rally behind their teams. But I was in Jerusalem. And here were Jews deliberately mocking other Jews.

During the hour or so that I spent at the scene, the police had to use force twice to control the haredi crowds. One Meretz supporter was pulled from his car when he stopped at a red light and a couple of photographers were pushed and shoved. I got one push myself.

Jerusalem is not only the scene of the conflict of Jews against Jews. The old, long-standing feud of Arabs against Jews also continues. En route to the Old City, I noticed how new a part of Jaffa Street looked. When I pointed this out to the friend I was with, he told me the new store-front windows were put in after the bus 18 bombings. I was in the spot where they had taken place. These parts of Jaffa Street, like other locations in the country, serve as memorials to victims of terrorism whether or not there is a formal monument in place.

When I left Israel at the end of August, the Haredim had not yet gone through with a mass demonstration they had planned at that time, to obstruct 30 junctions throughout the city. They were intent on throwing their opposition to a court ruling that Bar Ilan Street should not be closed. This demonstration was delayed because of organizational problems. A compromise has yet to be reached.

On my flight home from London to Toronto, I sat beside an Australian woman. After telling her that I was on my way home from Israel, she told me how much she respects the Jewish people because of the turbulent history we have gone through. I'm glad she hasn't heard of our escalating internal conflicts. It would be embarrassing to tell her that with all the prblems we face in the outside world, we make matters worse by infighting.

A new year

With Selichot having begun and Rosh Hashanah a few days away, my thoughts turn to the very source of our Jewish existence, our Bible.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Last Shabbat, the Haftorah (the prophetic selection read after the Torah reading) contained a saying that many readers find difficult to understand. The prophet Isaiah proclaims that when the people of Israel suffer, God too is suffering (63:9).

It seems like a strange concept, for what does it say about God's omnipotence. Isn't the Almighty, as the name suggests, all-powerful? Why does an Almighty God have to suffer, and why would the Sovereign of the world allow a Holocaust to happen, an event of such proportions that it nearly wiped out the Torah's "chosen people"? These are difficult questions — and no one will expect a column such as this to answer them. But such questions are important to us, for on their answers depends the possibility of belief in a merciful and just God, whose true nature will always escape human understanding.

With the image of a suffering God, the prophet no doubt meant to convey the sense of God's closeness to Israel. When we are persecuted, God is filled with anger, even wrath, especially when there is no one to help. In this sense, Isaiah says that the Divine Presence too is afflicted. God thus appears as both powerful and vulnerable, In the prophet's view, these two Divine characteristics are clearly compatible, even as they are compatible in the human being — and the poet uses human language to convey what is essentially inaccessible.

For Isaiah, God struggles forever with human evil and its consequences. Israel is not the only nation to suffer its effects, but Israel is of special Divine concern. God interferes in history only when ultimate disaster may thwart the Divine purpose — but in the process the Eternal too suffers. For the human race has from the beginning caused God anger and disappointment. Hence the metaphor of the Eternal who is afflicted while history takes its human course.

If all this sounds difficult, it is. Religion does not deal with simple answers, with always clear-cut yes-and-no, black-and-white. God's ways are often hidden from us, and it is the function of faith to bridge the gap. This is the season to rev up our spiritual batteries and face the difficult questions of our existence.

One last reminder: If you are only an occasional visitor to the synagogue, don't expect the rabbi and chazzan to perform spiritual miracles for you. It won't work, and you'll leave disappointed. You've got to bring yourself — as a participant, not a bystander. That way you'll get more out of Rosh Hashanah.

The substance of this article is taken from Rabbi Plaut's latest work, The Haftarah Commentary.

Jewish life on and off campus

It is the beginning of a new school year and the McGill campus is bustling with activity as first-year students with expressions of confusion and fear on their faces get their first taste of university bureaucracy.

By Hartley Lachter

I remember my first few days at university, waiting in lines for ID cards, going to orientation sessions, talking to different academic advisors (who never really gave me anything I would call advice) and feeling overwhelmed by such a big place.

For Jewish students, there is the added concern of where to go for the first Shabbat dinner and how to tap into the Jewish student community. However, Jewish students are often concerned with more than just Jewish life on campus. They are also interested in the Jewish community in general, whether it be going to political rallies for Jewish causes, teaching elementary religious school part time, finding kosher food and of course, going to shul.

University can be a very defining time in the life of many young Jews, simply because the decision to get involved with Jewish activities on and off campus is completely up to the students themselves. For many, this is their first time away from home, where things like Shabbat dinner and High Holy Day services just happen.

Shabbat dinner invitations

When you get to university, you have to make these things happen. Though there are some Jewish students who go off to school and never have anything to do with Judaism, there are still a considerable number of students who make Jewish social and religious activities a top priority. If you go to a synagogue which is located near a university campus, you may see some of these interested Jewish students at services for Shabbat, Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and other holidays.

As a Jewish student, I have always been impressed by how welcoming the Jewish community is to university-age Jews. I have never heard of anyone who did not get at least three invitations for Shabbat dinner on their first visit to shul after coming to a new city to go to school. After a hectic week trying to navigate the ins and outs of the university system, a nice meal in a real house with a real family is very appreciated.

However, I have always found it a little curious that as much as congregation members are delighted to see Jewish students at shul, they are also amazed. Almost every other student I have asked has said that people at shul are usually surprised even to see students on the High Holy Days. Perhaps this is due to a misconception that university is a completely separate world unto itself which prevents students from getting involved in non-university activities. Perhaps it is a common assumption that all Jewish students lose touch with their Judaism while they are at school. Whatever the case may be, Jewish students want to feel welcome rather than unusual. Though the university community is distinct, it is not exclusive, and Jewish students, if properly encouraged and supported, can become a vibrant part of any Jewish community.

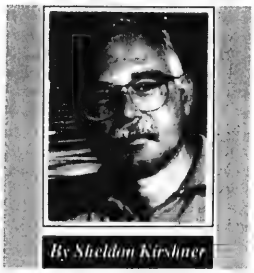
Historic buildings at serious risk



Like memory, architecture is an integral component of a culture. Buildings, particularly distinguished ones, unlock the key to a civilization at a given point in history. All too often, unfortunately, buildings rise and fall, succumbing to the ravages of time or falling victim to religious rivalries, maurauding armies or simple neglect.

Today, in Europe and in the Middle East, a number of historic buildings, notably synagogues, are at serious risk. If preservation efforts are not undertaken soon, they will collapse, never to be seen again except in glossy, inanimate coffee-table books.

The World Monuments Fund, a private, non-profit, New York City-based organization dedicated to identifying imperilled heritage sites around the world, has published a list of endangered buildings of Jewish interest. They are:

•The White City, Tel Aviv. There was a construction boom in Tel Aviv in the 1930s. Architects fleeing Nazi tyranny designed an ensemble of buildings inspired by the Bauhaus movement. Its leading exponent was Erich Mendelsohn. Today, these buildings — some 1,000 in number — are threatened by development. City hall is preparing a plan to protect them. But in the meantime, some of the buildings are being levelled.

•Prozna Street, Warsaw, Poland. Four large tenement buildings, once in the heart of the Jewish district, are in a dangerously decrepit state. Nearby construction projects may further destabilize them.

•Boskovice, Czech Republic. One of the best preserved Jewish quarters in Eastern Europe, with 150 buildings. It has been designated as an urban conservation area.

•Subotica Synagogue, Subotica, Yugoslavia. One of the finest surviving examples of the architecture of the late 19th century Secessionist movement. The roof has been fixed, but the rest of the building is in dire need of restoration.

•Rabbi Shlomo Ibn Danan Synagogue, Fes, Morocco. One of the best preserved synagogues in North Africa. Constructed in the 17th century. It is not maintained, and furnishings are at great risk.

•Etz Hayim Synagogue, Hanina, Greece. Built in the 15th century. The centre of Crete's Jewish community before the Holocaust. The building is in very poor condition.

•Slonim Synagogue, Slonim, Belarus. One of the grandest shuls in the region. Built in the Baroque style in 1642. Now used as a warehouse. The Belarus government has expressed an interest in preserving the building.

•Pfaffenhoffen Synagogue, Pfaffenhoffen, France. The only surviving synagogue predating the French Revolution. Listed as a national historic monument. Requires urgent repairs.

An original work

Before xenophobic restrictions curbed the flow in the 1920s, the United States welcomed nearly a limitless number of white immigrants, including Jews, with open arms.

For the newcomers, the overriding challenge was how best to adapt to life in America. All too often, as they discovered, the key to their acculturation was not only an acquaintanceship with English and local customs, but interestingly enough, a willingness to buy consumer goods.

At first glance, this thesis may sound somewhat trite and perhaps irrelevant. But after you've read Andrew Heinze's Adapting to Abundance (Columbia University Press, $35 US), an original work of social history, you may well be forced to revise your view.

More than 20 million immigrants settled in the United States between the 1870s and 1914. Among them were hundreds of thousands of Jews, mainly from Eastern Europe. Eager to establish themselves, they responded to the condition of mass consumption, recognizing that, as consumers, they could begin to move toward the goal of fitting into the mainstream.

Through the marketplace, they had the opportunity almost immediately to adapt to their new surroundings, writes Heinze. While the English language was an essential avenue into American culture, habits of consumption were an easier point of entry.

The prospect of consumption attracted everyone, regardless of religion or ethnicity. But Jews were particularly driven toward the acquisition and manufacture of consumer goods, and Jewish neighborhoods in American cities offered them a range of products that would have been simply inconceivable in Eastern Europe.

The piano in the parlor — an ideal of home furnishing in the late 19th century — was a major symbol of social status. Clothing, too, was an important symbol of cultural transformation. Clothes were a means by which Jews announced their desire to adapt to the norms of the day, a sign of Americanization. "The new suit of clothes," Heinze observes, "gave physical form to the essentially spiritual undertaking of aliens striving for membership in a new society."

Eventually, the Sabbath evolved into a day for shopping, except, of course, among the truly Orthodox. The legion of stores in New York City's Lower East Side was vivid testimony to the importance of shopping in the Jewish calendar.

The increased prospects for consumption enabled Jewish women to increase their already strong influence in the family. Through their role as consumers and managers of household consumption, they smoothed the transition to Americanization.

In America, then, Jews moved from a world of scarcity to a world of abundance. And as consumers, they were able to blend into a society with which they and their offspring could identify.

A still small voice

BY RABBI DAVID ROSENBERG

Rosh Hashanah ushers in the season of divine judgment and human repentance: "On Rosh Hashanah their destiny is inscribed and on Yom Kippur it is sealed...but repentance, prayer and tzedakah cancel the stern decree."

The famous prayer, Unetaneh Tokef, proclaims the awesomeness of this time in a pair of contrasting images: "The great shofar [of judgment] is sounded; a still, small voice is heard."

The still, small voice recalls Elijah's experience at Mount Horeb after his victory over the prophets of Baal (I Kings, chapter 19). There, Elijah shares with God his rage at the people of Israel for forsaking God's covenant. God responds with an awesome display: "There was a great and mighty wind...but the Lord was not in the wind. After the wind – an earthquake; but the Lord was not in the earthquake. After the earthquake – fire, but the Lord was not in the fire. And after the fire – a still, small voice."

Rabbi Levy ben Gerson (Gersonides, 14th century) writes in his commentary to this passage that God desired to moderate Elijah's wrath. God presented wind, quake and fire as emblems of an unwarranted, violent response to the backslidings of Israel. He chose "a still, small voice" – a milder form of discipline. Elijah was too angry to pay any heed and simply reiterated his condemnation of the Israelites. God then told Elijah to appoint Elisha as prophet instead of him. Elijah's wrath had gone too far.

It is tempting for those of us who are traditionalists – as it was for Elijah at Horeb – to call down the wrath of God upon the vast majority of our people who will not bear the yoke of the mitzvot and especially upon those who teach and preach accordingly. However, the still, small voice of God's discipline at Horeb suggests we leave off condemning and take up gentle persuasion – particularly in an age when Jews see religious behavior as a private matter of conscience.

If most Jews do not find kashrut, for example, compelling, let those of us who do so, advocate the practice of kashrut with love. In the meantime, both the observant and the non-observant are part of our community in all its messy complexity.

Let me illustrate with an example from my community (London). Federation has proposed that the Reform temple and local day school co-locate with the JCC. This proposal would not be acceptable to Temple Israel without provisions for a kitchen for the temple's own use. Such a kitchen, functioning independently of the communal, kosher-supervised kitchens, would not be considered kosher in a halachic sense. However, the Temple feels as a matter of what it sees as religious principle – the principle of autonomy – that it should be able to conduct a kitchen that does not conform with the Halachah.

An Orthodox rabbi could easily have obstructed the proposal. Instead, I have responded by helping to craft a policy that will enable the Temple to use its own kitchen for its purposes and will still maintain the kashrut and communal aspect of the JCC's kosher kitchens. I have done so out of the conviction that if Federation's proposal withers on the vine, then the entire community – including my synagogue – will be weakened. I have done so knowing that beyond the great shofar of judgment may be heard the still, small voice of God.

The great shofar of judgment calls on us to look into ourselves and rededicate ourselves to God and our fellows. The still, small voice lovingly teaches us that the path of repentance – for each of us and for our people – must be undertaken with humility and mutual respect.

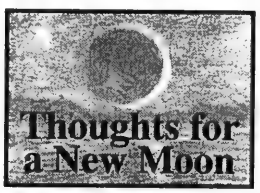
Change essential part of life



By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

On the first day of Rosh Hashanah, we read the Torah portion where God "remembers" the matriarch Sarah and the promise made that she will bear a child. The story of the birth of Isaac unfolds. On the second day of Rosh Hashanah, we read of the binding of Isaac by his father Abraham and the attempt to sacrifice Isaac to God. The first story speaks of life beginning and a promise fulfilled, while the second story documents the line walked by father and son between life and death.

Sarah's voice is silent during the "binding," but is she truly absent? What is Sarah's connection to our New Year?

The story of Isaac's birth is unusual, since Sarah was of advanced age and had already undergone menopause. It is fitting that this story be read every Rosh Hashanah, for it reinforces the notion that any life can undergo change at any stage — it is never too late. Sarah's reaction to the birth is understood to be extremely joyous, and yet one can also read hesitation and uncertainty in her responses.

Changes, although positive, are changes nonetheless, and we are creatures of habit. It may be unsettling to introduce alterations into our lives, as joyous as they may be. The 10 days of repentance between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are the time we introduce changes into our lives. We understand Sarah's unbridled joy as well as her hesitation.

Silence of Sarah is deafening

The second Torah portion, the binding of Isaac, centres on Abraham, Isaac and God. Sarah is absent. The story focuses on one man's struggle with his God, and yet the silence of Sarah is deafening.

Immediately following this text the Torah tells of the death of Sarah and many commentaries connect the two events. Sarah could not survive the trauma and the betrayal she experienced during that episode. Her husband, her son and her God together were walking the fine line between life and death, but Sarah could not endure. Her death was a reaction to the events around her and not a judgment against her.

We believe that the world in its entirety is judged on Rosh Hashanah and its fates are sealed on various days throughout the year. The fates of human beings are sealed on Yom Kippur. We grapple with this concept and conclude that if we are "good," we are granted a positive decree; but we are guilty of simplification.

The Torah forbids us to live our lives in isolation either from our families or from the world at large. We are constantly reaching to events which occur beyond our spheres of control and these reactions play a part in our fate. In taking stock of our lives, we must never ignore the impact of our actions upon others.

Sarah teaches us both the joy and the difficulty of embracing change. She also shows us the frailty of our imprint on others. On Rosh Hashanah, while we are evaluating ourselves, we must also remember those whose lives we touch.

Many excellent Internet sites for the High Holidays

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Sometimes it's crucial to pull over to the shoulder of the Highway and examine where you've been, where you're going and whether you really are taking the right route. There are many excellent sites on the Internet that help you to do just that – prepare for the holidays of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

Of the numerous sites which summarize the customs of these holidays, a favorite is Neat Customs of Rosh Hashanah [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/customs.htm]. There you'll find the proper Holiday greeting ("May you be inscribed and sealed immediately for a good life"), a guide to holiday foods (a round challah, a fish head, beets, leeks and more) and the tradition of refraining from sleeping on the afternoon of Rosh Hashanah. The Jerusalem Talmud says, "If one sleeps at the year's beginning (Rosh Hashanah), his good fortune likewise sleeps."

There are many other sites that explain these traditions such as Project Genesis' links at [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/] Virtual Jerusalem's at [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/] and the several articles starting with The Month of Tishrei at [http://members.aol.com/jewfaq/holiday1.htm].

Another good overview of Rosh Hashanah rituals (including the traditions of Reform Jews) was prepared by Temple Israel of Westport, Connecticut [http://www.shamash.org/reform/uahc/congs/ct/ct004/Target.html].

And Montreal's Joseph Ohayon is creator of the Sepharade Page where you can find a French-language summary of the laws of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur in addition to some short stories about the holiday season [http://www.webcom.com/rel/ROSHHA.html].

The focus at this time of year is tshuvah or repentance. Ohr Somayach's Rabbi Michoel Schoen examines The Concept of Tshuvah [http://www.virtual.co.il/ education/education/ohr/special/ roshhash/rosh94.htm] and Eliezer Segal writes about the connection between repentance and the choice of the Book of Jonah as the Torah reading on Yom Kippur afternoon [http://acs6.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/950921_Jonah.html]. (And while you're in the neighborhood, check out some of Prof. Segal's essays about the Days of Awe at [http://acs6.acs. ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/Calendar_Index.html#RH].)

Central to holiday services of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur is the Hebrew religious poem, the piyyut. Rabbi Ismar Schorsch, chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary examines the history of the piyyut [http://www.jtsa. edu/pubs/parashah/5755/rosh hashanah.html] and then takes a very personal look at the piyyutim he finds in his own cherished machzor handed down to him by his father.

For something a bit different, take a look at Holidays with a Twist [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/holidays.htm] put out by The Student & Academics Department of the World Zionist Organization. This is a collection of essays with titles like You Don't Have a Prayer and The Highest Holidays - A Survival Guide. ("...sitting in an Orthodox Shul, I was aware of two emotions: One of absolute awe watching everyone swathed in a tallit swaying and shouting, the other, absolute boredom...") These articles are provocative and conversational and are bound to generate discussion about the true meaning of prayer and repentance as we enter the Days of Awe.

Also included in this site is the I.L. Peretz' legend Neilah in Gehenna [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/neilah.htm]. This is the tale of the amazing Cantor of Ladam who could not only bring his congregation to repentance but was able to do the same for the denizens of Hell.

Another timely story with a would-be chazzan as the main character is the chassidic fable The Cantor and the Righteous Man. [http://www.jcn18.com/rh570001.htm].

Like most Jewish festivals, Rosh Hashanah has no shortage of traditions centred around food such as dipping an apple in honey on the first night of the holiday. There is also a tradition of eating a new fruit on the second night of the holiday. For some people, this means venturing down new supermarket aisles in search of strange, exotic delicacies which can be puzzling to the novice. So if you want to understand more about the passion fruit, loquats or ugli fruit you've just bought go to [http://pathfinder.com/@@Qm0AgwQAkRTtO8vC/thrive/eats/zucchini.07-19-96.html].

And to uncover the mysteries of what to do with your guava ("Don't peel guava because the edible rind has a large concentration of vitamin C") papaya, moya or star fruit, take a look at [http://www.aloha.com/%7Eritt/]. Finally, let's not forget the pomegranate, one of the tastiest (and messiest) of all the New Years' fruits. [http://www.fatfree.com/foodweb/food/pomegranate.html].

As for the meals themselves, the Epicurious food site [http://www.epicurious.com/e_eating/e06_jewish_cooking/recipes/recipes.html] offers meal-planning tips and full recipes for both holidays. The Hungarian Rosh Hashanah Dinner starts off with gefilte fish followed by chicken fricassee, egg barley with mushrooms and concludes, of course, with honey cake. The Yom Kippur American Break-the-Fast Meal offers challah, herring with sour cream, lick-your-fingers kugel and cheesecake.

Enough with all that reading. If you prefer to hear about the holidays rather than squinting at a computer screen, then don't miss the "613.org" site. [http://www.613.org/roshyomkippursuccot.html] This page is full of audio files on such topics as Reflections on the New Year, Women, Yom Kippur and the Future of American Jewry and The Essence of Kol Nidra. Please note that some of these lectures run over an hour.

I enjoyed Rabbi Ephraim Buchwald's five-minute Story of Divine Judgement. [http://www.613.org/njop-roshstory.ram] As for music, there is the chassidic melody Darkecha Elokainu from the Yom Kippur liturgy. [http://www.613.org/music/darkecha.ram]

(To hear these files, you'll need to download the free RealAudio software from [http://www.realaudio.com/products/player/index.html]. If you have a 14.4 Kbps modem, you'll find the audio quality passable. If you have a 28.8 Kbps or faster connection, you should enjoy music-quality audio.)

Speaking of music, perhaps the most famous tradition of this time of year is gathering in synagogue to hear the haunting tones of the shofar.

If you've always wanted a shofar of your own, you can order your one right on the Jewish Highway. The Lark In The Morning Company of Mendocino, Calif. [http://www.mhs.mendocino.k12.ca.us/MenComNet/Business/Retail/Larknet/Winds] will sell you an Israeli-made extra large Yemenite Shofar for US $240...not including the Lucite stand.

If you're not in the market for a shofar but can't get enough of the sound of that instrument, no problem. Just type in [http://www.613.org/shofar14.ram] and have a "blast."

And on that note, I would like to wish all my readers and their families Shanah Tovah U'metukah, a good and sweet new year and May you be inscribed and sealed for a good life.

Creating the Jewish Future through the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University

A Message from the Director

At this season of looking before and after, it is my pleasure to extend greetings to the community from the York University Centre for Jewish Studies.

The last year was one of unprecedented growth at the Centre. New faculty appointments in Jewish teacher education and Hebrew Bible, as well as our October conference, CREATING THE JEWISH FUTURE, promise to make 5757 at least as exciting.

At York we offer two undergraduate Jewish Studies programs – a Bachelor of Arts and a combined Bachelor of Arts/Bachelor of Education – to some four thousand students. Areas of focus include: Hebrew language and literature, classical Jewish texts, Jewish education, Jewish thought and history, Jewish community studies (especially Canadian community), Holocaust, Sephardic culture, Jewish women's studies, Jewish film, and Jewish sport and recreation. In addition, we sponsor a variety of programs open to students and faculty and to the public.

At this time, I want to thank publicly all those who have helped to enhance the activities of the York Centre. I hope that we may continue to enjoy broad community support, and I invite you to participate in creating the Jewish future through the York Centre for Jewish Studies.

The Campaign

York University, one of Canada's largest and most influential institutions of higher learning, has recently embarked on a major fund-raising campaign. Mr. Martin Goldfarb, Chairman of The Goldfarb Corporation and a long-time member of York's Board of Governors, has assumed the chair of the Centre for Jewish Studies Campaign Committee. Recently Goldfarb noted that "York is the university of choice for over four thousand Jewish Canadians." With its special programs in Canadian-Jewish Studies, Jewish Education, and Sephardic Studies, he said, it "serves the Jewish community better than any other in Canada." The Centre for Jewish Studies participates in the State of Israel Bonds Double Mitzvah program. Among Centre supporters are the federal Program in Multiculturalism and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

If you would like to become a friend of York's Centre for Jewish Studies please contact Professor Michael Brown at (416) 736-5823.

Abraham still a true model

By RABBI MAURY KELMAN

After living in Israel for some three years, I am beginning to truly appreciate the first pillar of Judaism, Abraham. While our forefather introduced God to the world, he is perhaps best known for his incomparable hospitality which lovingly touched all who came in contact with him. A wealthy farmer with real estate holdings in swanky suburban Hebron, Abraham nevertheless was constantly on the lookout for guests, personally preparing meals for weary travellers on the Mesopotamia-Canaan superhighway.

While I clearly will never reach Abraham's boundless level of hospitality, I have had the opportunity over the past three years to open my own inn. Of course, I don't get paid for putting up guests, but my home has somewhat resembled a lodge, with guests whom I barely know mysteriously appearing to favor me with their company. In fact, one of the advantages of my living here has been my uncanny knack for suddenly discovering new friends and bosom buddies, or rather of their knack for discovering me. Recently, my phone rang. After I had spent three minutes trying to locate the cordless apparatus, an unfamiliar voice nearly shattered my right eardrum.

"Maury, how ya doin'? It's Melvin calling."

My mind quickly traversed through all the events of my life, unsuccessfully searching for any sign of a Melvin. Having just hung up on a certain Herman who claimed to have gone moose hunting with me in Algonquin Park and was thus entitled to stay with me during his two-month sojourn in Israel, I was in no mood for games.

"Melvin who?" I queried.

"Why, it's Melvin Mermelstein," he responded matter of factly. "You must remember me. We used to ride the same bus in Grade 3 to school. Well anyways, I just got to Israel and I figured I'd look you up. Old times sake, you know. Well anyways, I don't really know anyone here, and it's my first time here. I figured you'd love to hear a familiar voice from the old country. Well, anyways, to come to the point (by this time I had already figured out the point), I thought that for old times sake, it'd be great if I could stay with you while I'm here."

"To tell you the truth, Melvin, three guests just left and —

"Oh, you're such a great guy. I was debating whether to call you, but I knew you'd come through. I'm at the airport now, so just tell me how to get there. And by the way, I kind of forgot my money so I'd appreciate it if you could just pay the cab driver when he gets to your place. Thanks a lot — you're much nicer than that guy from my Grade 4 play who hung up on me when I called him in Paris."

Jealous of more practical former schoolmates in Paris, I endured Melvin for three weeks. He even bought me a pint of milk upon his departure ("for old times sake") and left me three socks. I'm still waiting for my phone bill, but I'm sure I have nothing to worry about, as Melvin assured me that most of the calls were within Israel. I also thought it was thoughtful of my long-lost friend to assure me that he would extol my hospitality to all that he knew, letting them know that I had the perfect place to stay in Jerusalem.

For an inexplicable reason, this year seems to have attracted the most traffic to my apartment. Perhaps my friends have misinterpreted the Jerusalem 3000 celebrations to mean that I am supposed to host 3,000 guests during the course of the year. In fact, I recently received a phone call from an Egyptian acquaintance dreading the upcoming "Egypt 4200" celebrations and his expected 4,200 guests. I can only pity the Edenites who will have to endure some 5,760 guests during the Spanish inspired and much awaited "Eden — Celebrating 5760 Years of Expulsion."

Whatever the reason may be, the guests continue to come, with some of them even reserving three days beforehand. While most guests have given the accommodations four stars, I cannot be content with a rating below the Laromme or King David hotels. Thus, in an attempt to improve services, I have decided to take a number of steps. To ease the registration process, I am thinking of installing a toll-free number.

Guests will no longer have to place their dishes in the sink. In addition, visitors will no longer have to fold up the couches or pick up their dirty laundry left strewn around the apartment. Fully uniformed chambermaids with prim bonnets are now being trained for the intricacies of those tasks. I have just concluded a deal with one of the finest Belgian confectioners to produce exquisite pillow mints. If guests desire more privacy, they have the option of asking me to leave for a maximum of six days.

In short, I will go to all lengths to ensure that my company feels in no way inferior to visitors plunking down hundreds of dollars to stay at other high class inns. While I feel confident that these improvements will encourage maximum capacity, one can never predict the whims and strange behavior of some people who may actually prefer the King David.

Thus, I have come up with the perfect solution to attract even greater numbers. Recognizing that some guests may feel a twinge of embarrassment with the array of towels they have taken from hotels, I have decided to leave my towels anonymous. As I say in my new North American marketing campaign, "Come Stay With Me — Even The Towels Are Free."

Zigler finds a new niche at Bernard Betel

Communities cannot function and prosper without the commitment, care and tireless efforts, mostly unrecognized, of countless hard-working individuals. They are the "unsung heroes" of the community. Spotlight will appear occasionally.

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In her early 40s and newly divorced, Barbara Zigler decided her life needed a new direction.

With three teenagers at home, she completed Grade 13 and went on to get a social service diploma from Centennial College.

"I sought a new path and I have not looked back," says Zigler, 57, now coordinator of volunteer services at Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, a non-profit, multi-purpose centre for independent seniors.

"Luckily not long after I graduated, the centre had an opening. I had worked there as a student and I was taken by its warmth and hospitality."

Ten years later, Zigler says, the people at the centre are like her second family. "That is a big family," she says with a laugh. "Four hundred volunteers, most of whom are members of the centre, oversee 36 different committees, including special events, an abuse program, public affairs or social action. What I do is look after the recruitment, training and placement of these volunteers.

"A number of committees and activities are open to members only. Members man the information desk and sit on the membership committee, ritual committee, volunteer committee, ways and means committee and food services committee to name a few. Non-members may teach English as a second language, help out in the health clinic, do office work or be a friendly visitor."

As well as facilitating ways and means, the in-house fundraising committee, Zigler coordinates day trips and longer tours and is in the midst of developing a leadership training program in conjunction with the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

"I also do social work on an informal basis. I mediate and help volunteers on various committees work things out. Sometimes they just need to talk to someone else in order to see things differently. I get to know the members. I know when they need an arm around their shoulder or an ear to listen to them."

Barbara Zigler

Zigler, who lived with her grandmother as a child, says she has always liked older people "and I love working with them. I find this a tremendously gratifying position. A lot of the members have suffered losses and come to the centre depressed and a little lost. To see them move on to become highly functioning and motivated is very satisfying. They see coming to the centre as a reason to get up and get out of bed. Its really a two-fold thing. They are helping themselves and helping us at the same time."

She credits staff at Bernard Betel for appreciating the volunteers. A volunteer Bill of Rights ensures such things as the right to be treated as a co-worker, not just free help; the right to a suitable assignment; the right to appropriate training; and the right to sound guidance and direction.

Wolfe Fellowship awarded

TORONTO — The 1996-'97 Ray D. Wolfe Fellowship in Jewish Studies has been awarded to Dr. Sharon Green, according to an announcement from the University of Toronto.

Green, who lives in Thornhill, was chosen from among the best newly-awarded PhDs in Jewish studies in an international competition. The fellowship provides a year of financial support to enable new PhDs to prepare their research for publication.

A Canadian, Green received her PhD from Brandeis University. As a Ray D. Wolfe Fellow, she will focus her efforts on the publication of her thesis, The Problem of Love in the Work of S.Y. Agnon.

While at U of T, Green will also teach a third-year undergraduate course in the department of Near and Middle Eastern civilizations on Contemporary Israeli Literature in Translation.

Green has given lectures for such organizations as the American Academy of Religion, the Art Gallery of Ontario and U of T's Jewish Studies Program.

She has translated, edited and introduced such works as And They Will Call Us: Poems of the Holocaust and contributed "The Golden Age of Yiddish Literature: From the Late Nineteenth Century Until the Outbreak of World War II" to Yiddish Panorama: A Thousand Years of Yiddish Language, Literature and Culture.

Dr. Sharon Green

The Ray D. Wolfe Fellowship in Jewish Studies was endowed by the late community leader Ray Wolfe and by Rose Wolfe, the current chancellor of the University of Toronto.

Super Sunday

UJA telephone blitz benefits community

Hundreds of UJA Federation volunteers made thousands of calls Sunday to the community on behalf of the community. It was Super Sunday, a yearly September tradition and Jewish Toronto's most successful one day fundraising event.

Super Sunday is a key component of the UJA Federation annual campaign to raise money for essential services in our community and Israel and for the rescue of Jews in danger around the world.

"Super Sunday is especially appealing to newcomers to UJA Federation," noted Debbi Stern, who co-chaired the telethon with her father Don Rafelman. Stern was also happy to see how many people brought family and friends along to help out.

But the real magic behind Super Sunday comes from volunteers who return year after year to show their support and rally the community.

David Green, who has been campaigning for UJA Federation for five years says he enjoys the challenge of reaching non-contributors, a major priority in this year's campaign. "There is a mutual involvement between the campaigner and the person on the other end of the telephone," explained Green. "Both parties are providing each other with the opportunity to perform an important mitzva."

Fay Gold has been a campaigner for as long as she can remember. "UJA Federation is an extremely important cause," said Gold. "No other organization embraces such a diversity of projects in Canada and in Israel."

Since 1988, Paul Silvertown has been doing what he calls "selling the UJA product with all my heart." He sees campaigning as "an opportunity to network with other community-minded individuals."

According to social worker Eva Ingbor, "the most important aspect of Super Sunday is acknowledging that any gift, regardless of amount, is important because it demonstrates one's commitment to the community."

Betty Gerstein sums it up this way: "Super Sunday is all about reaching out to the community. There are many people who would commit their time and money if only they were approached."

Community Partners

Nurturing Jewish identity

Glennie Lindenberg and Howard Price have more in common than being co-chairs of UJA Federation's Professions Cabinet. They both feel that volunteering for the community plays a large role in defining their Jewish identities.

Glennie Lindenberg

Lindenberg first got involved with UJA Federation in 1982 as a member of the Business and Professional Women's Network. "It seemed like a tailor-made avenue for me," recalls Lindenberg who became chair of the Network two years later.

After rising through the UJA Federation ranks as co-chair of the New Leadership Council and Women's Campaign, she became President of Jewish Women's Federation in 1994.

"When I was approached for the presidency I knew it was an opportunity that I had to take," explains Lindenberg. "I believe JWF is an important voice representing women in the Jewish community."

Lindenberg's dedication remains strong in her new role and she believes the Professions Cabinet is "a sound structure for getting people more connected to the community."

"It's very simple," she says. "I'm very fortunate to be in a position to give of myself. I consider it a privilege."

So does Dr. Howard Price, who started his UJA Federation volunteer career as a canvasser shortly after he began practising 15 years ago.

Although he admits he was never comfortable asking people for money, Price believes in "getting down to the nitty gritty."

"Jews have to help each other and if that means calling people up for donations...so be it."

Price considers himself fortunate to be the grandson of Jewish immigrants who ended up in Canada. "It was the luck of the draw that I'm not somewhere else having a rough time, instead of here."

"No matter how bad things may be getting for physicians," says Price, "we've got it a lot better than those who rely on the community for support."

And so Price remains focused on doing what he can for the community. "Part of being Jewish," he stresses, "is helping each other." If we lose that, we've lost our identity."

Dr. Howard Price

Sephardic presence strengthens community

UJA Federation and Toronto's Sephardic community have begun sowing the seeds of a new partnership as part of an ongoing initiative to build bridges with diverse segments of Toronto's Jewish community.

Jacques Sayegh

Sephardic representatives and UJA Federation officials met recently to discuss ways of tapping into the strengths of Toronto's growing Sephardic community.

"We've made it a priority to form a mutually beneficial relationship that will enrich the entire Jewish population of Metro Toronto," explains Dr. Harry Krakowsky, Chair of UJA Federation's Community Cabinet.

There are more than 30,000 Sephardic Jews living in Toronto, many of whom have recently emigrated from Montreal and Israel. The community, made up of Jews from Morocco, Spain, Iraq, Turkey and Yemen, among other countries, has six synagogues, a rabbinate headed by Rabbi Amram Assayag, a library, various associations and a program at York University. A new Or Haemet school is currently under construction on Bathurst just north of Steeles.

"It is essential to bring the Sephardic community into the UJA Federation umbrella," says Jacques Sayegh, an active member of the Sephardic community, who attended the meeting. "The nature of our institutions and traditions can help strengthen the entire Jewish community."

New Year, New directions for UJA Federation

For many organizations, the New Year signals change and redirection. Nowhere is this more evident than in the plans being outlined by UJA Federation for 1997 and beyond.

Government cutbacks introduced in the last two years and changes in the community's demographic character have necessistated what UJA Federation Executive Vice-President Allan Reitzes calls "an across the board re-evaluation of the way the Jewish community operates."

"We are positioning ourselves to be prepared to act in response to whatever challenges we will face in the next few years," explains UJA Federation President Sandra Brown. "We are saying that we are present and ready for action."

The kind of action Brown is talking about is far reaching and involves every aspect of Jewish communal life including the education system, long-term care for the elderly, hospital restructuring, immigration management, assistance for the poor and community-building.

UJA Federation campaign fundraising is changing as well to a more donor-focused approach in which, according to Brown, contributors are "partners based on knowledge and shared interests."

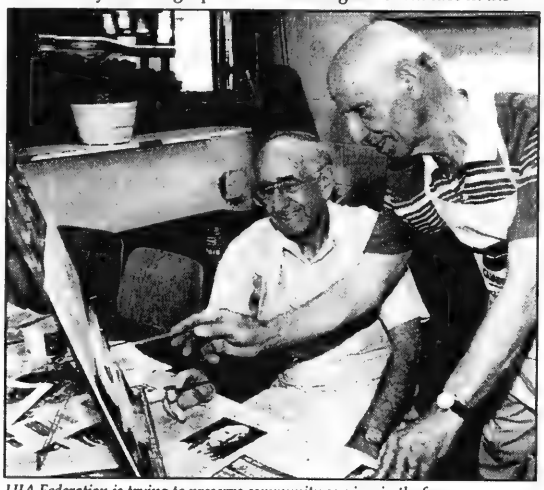
"Most people who are not contributing to the campaign know little about how UJA Federation functions," notes UJA Federation Campaign Chairman David Goldstein. "I believe they just need to be approached with the proper information, which is compelling, to obtain their support."

UJA Federation is also exploring ways to make better use of volunteers who are increasingly filling gaps left by lay offs and restructuring in the human services sector. "Our volunteers are one of our most valuable assets," says Alan Sandler, Vice-President of UJA Federation's Community Planning and Allocations Department (CP&A). "Effective recruitment and integration of these volunteers will allow us to continue to deliver many of the human services and programs that are hallmarks of our community and reflect core Jewish values."

Greater emphasis will be placed on building Jewish infrastructure in York region, north of Steeles, which holds the third highest concentration of Jews in Canada.

UJA Federation itself will also be changing by streamling departments and intensifying public relations to raise awareness within the community about the organization.

"Our goal," explains CP&A Director Morris Zbar, "is to adapt to new realities but continue to perpetuate the Jewish way of life. UJA Federation will always be the Jewish community's central address and so we must remain relevant in our function and effective in our constitution."



UJA Federation is trying to preserve community services in the face of government cutbacks.

Washington Fly-In previews election

If you can't wait until November to find out the significance of the U.S. Presidential election results, the 1997 UJA Federation Washington Fly-In could provide some important clues.

This year's Fly-In on Wednesday, October 23, takes place just two weeks before Americans choose their new leader, and UJA Federation is inviting participants to take an insider's look.

Upon arrival in the U.S. capital Fly-In members will be given the option of visiting either the world renowned Holocaust Memorial Museum or the Pentagon for an up-to-date briefing. Lunch will be served on Capitol Hill where the group will be addressed by a key member of Congress.

Participants will also be welcomed to the much acclaimed Canadian Embassy and the Israeli Embassy for an analysis of the differences between Canadian and American policy toward Israel.

Other topics for discussion during the day include terrorism and American militia groups, the changing relationship between the Diaspora and Israel, and what can be expected from a new American government.

A special presentation will also be made on the controversial book Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust, written by Harvard Professor Daniel Jonah Goldhagen.

Lorri Kushnir, who is chairing this year's Fly-In, is looking forward to being in Washington during what she calls "an atmosphere of change and anticipation." Kushnir is also eager to return to the Holocaust Museum for her third visit. "The museum," she says, "is a living documentary of the Holocaust that everyone must see."

The total cost per person is $485 with a minimum $1000 donation to UJA Federation. Three Year Vision supporters will have access to priority seating and 10 spots are available for university students at a discounted price of $100.

To find out more or to reserve tickets please call Marc Bookbinder at (416) 631-5703.

Mark Berenblut spent a quiet moment at the Holocaust Memorial Musem during last year's Washington Fly-In.

Yiddish inspires students of all ages

A little Yiddish for little people. That's what UJA Federation's Committee for Yiddish is offering as it expands classes for students of all ages.

The new and improved Yiddish program, jointly funded by the Committee for Yiddish and the North York and York Boards of Education, provides classes for adult beginners, intermediate and advanced students, those seeking high school credits and children on Sunday morning.

The children's classes, for students in junior kindergarten through grade eight, will be taught at Associated Hebrew School on Finch Avenue. "We will try to incorporate Yiddish through song and play and by teaching them about the holidays," explains teacher Sheila Tishler. "I love Yiddish and the thought of hearing the kids speak the language is very exciting for me."

Claudia Bickel is interested in continuing her Yiddish studies which she began last year so she can learn more about her family. Her grandfather, Shloime, was a Yiddish writer whose works Bickel has yet to read and understand.

"It's my way of exploring my Jewish identity," explains Bickel, who recently returned from taking part in the Uriel Weinreicht Program in Yiddish Language and Culture at Columbia University.

Bickel attributes the Yiddish revival in part to what she calls "a more free and secure atmosphere."

"This couldn't have happpened fifty years ago, " she adds, "when Jews were more concerned about merely existing peacefully with the rest of society."

Wallenberg's efforts lauded as bust unveiled in park

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Swedish war hero Raoul Wallenberg was a gentle man, "full of heart and empathy," his half-sister recalled here last Sunday in an address laced with history and emotion.

Nina Lagergren told over 1,200 people, many of them Hungarian Holocaust survivors and some owing their lives to her heroic half-brother, that she was not surprised Wallenberg did what he did because he was "beautiful and good humored . . . he was my best friend."

Lagergren, 75, travelled from Stockholm for the unveiling of a bust in Earl Bales Park paying tribute to Wallenberg, the courageous Swedish diplomat credited with rescuing some 100,000 Hungarian Jews from certain death during World War II.

But "it's impossible to say how many he saved," she told an audience that included federal Trade Minister Art Eggleton, Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick, Sweden's ambassador to Canada, Jan Stahl, and other dignitaries. "He saved your children and grandchildren and generations that came after you."

The self-effacing Lagergren painted a picture of her famous relative as an adventurous but caring man. Little-known facts about his life include a hitchhiking trip across the United States while Wallenberg studied at university in Michigan, and a stint at a Jewish-owned bank in Palestine in 1936. Later in Sweden, he worked to help Jewish war refugees.

To coincide with the unveiling, Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy last week announced that Ottawa will help pay the costs of research into the fate of Wallenberg, who disappeared into Soviet "protective custody" in 1945, and was never heard from again.

Leading the research will be Winnipeg human rights lawyer David Matas, a member of an international commission of inquiry into Wallenberg's fate set up a few years ago.

Dispatched to Budapest by then U.S. president Franklin Roosevelt in 1944, Wallenberg, the non-Jewish scion of a wealthy Swedish banking family, issued thousands of false passports to Jews, placing them under the protection of the neutral Swedish crown.

He lodged "his" Jews in 32 safe houses across Budapest, each flying the Swedish flag. He organized soup kitchens and make-shift hospitals. He would rush off by car with fake passes in hand to literally yank people out of lineups for trains heading to Auschwitz. And in 1945, he bullied and blustered the Nazis into calling off the destruction of Budapest's Jewish ghetto and its 75,000 inhabitants.

But he was arrested as a U.S. spy by the invading Soviets at war's end, and taken to a Moscow prison. Soon, he would be swallowed by the massive gulag, a hero gone but not forgotten.

It was "a catastrophe, a disaster" that Wallenberg never returned home from Budapest," said Lagergren. "But we never lost hope," she told The CJN just before the memorial's unveiling. "Without hope, we have nothing. We can never stop hoping."

Hope is what supporters around the world have clung to since 1947, the year the Kremlin announced that Wallenberg died of a heart attack in prison. Since then, there have been numerous reported sightings of the famous Swede by newly released prisoners, leading many to believe Wallenberg survived well beyond 1947.

Some, like Lagergren herself, hope against hope that he may even be alive today, at age 84, and still press for his release, or at least, the truth.

For his bravery, Wallenberg was made Canada's only honorary citizen in 1985.

Perched on a grassy hill behind the towering Holocaust monument in the park, the three-metre high bronze sculpture depicts Wallenberg partially surrounded by jail bars, hinting at the mystery surrounding his fate.

The work fulfils a life-long dream for sculptor Ernest Raab, who also created the Holocaust obelisk in the same park. A teenaged Raab once got a glimpse of Wallenberg while smuggling bread into a Swedish safe haven in Budapest.

The project's honorary chair, Toronto philanthropist Leslie Dan, himself a Hungarian survivor, told the gathering he had "a strong feeling that Raoul Wallenberg is here with us."

McGill University professor Irwin Cotler, who chaired the international probe into Wallenberg's fate, pointed out that "the disappeared hero of humanity" saved more Jews from the Nazis than any single government.

Cotler used the occasion to slam the world's "appalling indifference" to ethnic cleansing in Bosnia and the "preventable genocide" in Rwanda. "We cannot say we didn't know."

While welcoming Ottawa's latest initiative, Cotler called on the federal government to prosecute suspected Nazi war criminals in Canada "as a living legacy to Raoul Wallenberg."

Ben Kayfetz: more than a community observer

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For more than half a century, Ben Kayfetz has been a professional and lay observer of the Canadian Jewish community.

Recognized for his contributions as a writer, broadcaster and crusader for human rights, and as one of Canada's most knowledgeable documenters of Canadian Jewry, Kayfetz has witnessed and participated in numerous changes that have benefited society.

He began his career as a high school teacher, after receiving an honors BA in modern languages at the University of Toronto.

In 1945, as a uniformed civilian, he went to work for the Allies in post-war Germany. During his two-year stay there, he received a letter from Ben Lappin, director of community relations at the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. The letter changed his life.

Lappin wrote that he was returning to school to do post-graduate studies and wondered if Kayfetz was interested in applying for the position at Congress.

On his return to Canada in 1947, Kayfetz was interviewed by community leader J. Irving Oelbaum and by Rabbi Abraham Feinberg, who chaired the community relations committee.

Kayfetz took the position, and over the years was active in numerous committees, including Soviet Jewry, international affairs, Yiddish, archives, kashruth and Israel action.

Kayfetz was executive director of the national joint public relations committee of Congress and B'nai Brith, and remained an integral part of Congress until he retired in 1984.

Kayfetz's open-door office at 150 Beverley St. was the place where community leaders, politicians, individuals with problems and those who just wanted to shmooze came to seek advice, exchange ideas or initiate projects.

He recalls that his first major challenge began in 1947, when he began to work for the enactment of an anti-discrimination law in employment.

"At that time, there was no legislation. We had to argue that we needed a law. Employers such as Eaton's were not interested. They openly discriminated and they made no bones about it."

For the next four years, other groups joined the struggle for fair employment legislation. Congress worked with leaders in the Jewish and general communities until their coordinated efforts finally resulted in the enactment of fair labor laws.

"It was done in stages. We brought in speakers from the United States, met with [then] Premier Leslie Frost and after only four years — much sooner than we expected — Ontario passed the legislation. Over the years, other provinces followed suit."

They did not get the same cooperation in working on anti-discrimination laws and laws against the spreading of racial hatred, he says.

He adds that in those days, they thought only of race and religion in discussions of discrimination. Gender, the physically disabled and senior citizens came much later.

Kayfetz was involved in other policy changes, such as those involving religious education in public schools, an area which, he says, "is still hazy."

Ben Kayfetz

The principle of non-sectarian teaching in the public schools is much more widely accepted now, he says, "but legally there are still some loopholes."

In the 1960s, Congress became concerned with the increase in activities by neo-Nazi agitators and white supremacists. Lester Pearson, who was then prime minister, named a commission to make recommendations.

Headed by McGill law professor Maxwell Cohen, the committee included young law professor Pierre Elliott Trudeau. Kayfetz served as a resource person and his documentation and day-to-day journals were used in the committee's research.

"It was always at the bottom of the government's agenda," says Kayfetz. "Then someone suggested that we put it to the Senate and with the help of Senator Arthur Roebuck, in a free vote in 1970, laws were set in place for controlling the activities of these groups."

In 1962, Saul Hayes, national executive director of Congress, presented Kayfetz with one of his most interesting assignments.

After Fidel Castro came to power, the American Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), which was sending Passover supplies to Cuba through Canada, wanted a report on Cuba's Jews. Americans were not allowed to enter the country because the United States did not recognize the Castro government.

Hayes asked Kayfetz to go to Cuba to meet with leaders of the Ashkenazi and Sephardi communities. Kayfetz visited synagogues and Jewish organizations and found a depressed Jewish community.

"I walked right into the missile crisis," he says, after learning about the crisis in a telephone conversation with his wife Eva.

He describes his departure from Cuba as a harrowing experience. "I got a real taste of totalitarian life."

In 1965, Congress sent Kayfetz back to Cuba, "but no war broke out this time," he chuckles.

Looking back, Kayfetz says one of his major disappointments was the Canadian government's "betrayal" on the question of war crimes legislation.

"When we went to the government, they listened, but we now know that they had decided not to do anything."

Although he is adamant that he is not a professional historian, Kayfetz has published numerous articles and monographs on the Jewish community. He was in charge of historical research for the Toronto Jewish Centennial 1956-57, authored Toronto Jewry 60 Years Ago, has been a contributor to the Jewish Standard, the Globe and Mail, the Jewish Chronicle of London, England and the Jewish Telegraphic Agency. He is a regular commentator on CHIN radio.

Kayfetz, a soft-spoken and modest man, says, "I've been an observer of the community and tried to view the changes."

Reform rabbinical leader returns to pulpit

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Daniel Komito Gottlieb is going home again.

Seven years ago, Rob and Nadine Warren, founding members of Temple Kol Ami in Thornhill, sought his help for their fledgling congregation of 18 families. Now, on the eve of the High Holy Days, Rabbi Gottlieb has become the new spiritual leader of the temple's 180 families.

It is with excitement and high hopes that Rabbi Gottlieb is leaving his post as executive director for the past nine years of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ) to return to a full-time pulpit.

In those years, the number of congregations in Canada affiliated with the CCRJ increased from 19 to 25, plus three more in early stages, and the number of affiliated families from 6,000 to near 10,000.

"We're delighted that a demographic study by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto shows that the membership of Reform temples is increasing every generation," he said.

Rabbi Gottlieb succeeds Rabbi Nancy Wechsler, who was Temple Kol Ami's first full-time leader.

He is no stranger to the pulpit, as he has served as rabbi to several temples in the Toronto area when their own rabbis were away on sabbaticals.

Thornhill's growing Jewish population, especially of unaffiliated families, is a challenge to Rabbi Gottlieb. He was educational director in its early days of Thornhill's larger and well-established Temple Har Zion.

Reform congregations born during Rabbi Gottlieb's tenure with the CCRJ have been Or Hadesh in Newmarket; Shaarei Beth-El in Oakville; Temple Beth Tikvah in Regina; Baycrest Hospital in Toronto; and Temple Tikvah in St. Catharines.

There are now 11 such congregations in the Greater Toronto area, plus three just getting underway: the Downtown Reform Minyan; B'nai Shalom V-Tikvah serving Ajax-Pickering; and the Riverdale Minyan.

One of only six Canadian-born Reform rabbis in this country, Rabbi Gottlieb said he is delighted to take over a pulpit and remain part of the CCRJ family.

Temple Kol Ami is located in one wing of the new Leo Baeck Day School at 36 Atkinson Ave., Thornhill, 905-709-2620.

Massuah launches new Eichmann exhibit

TORONTO — A new initiative that will include an interactive exhibit devoted to the trial of Adolf Eichmann has been undertaken by the Canadian Friends of Massuah.

The purpose is to promote the expansion of the museum at the Massuah Institute for the Study of the Holocaust. Over 200,000 students, young adults and teachers have participated in Massuah's seminars and lecture series since the Institute was founded in the 1960s on the grounds of Kibbutz Tel-Itzhak, near Netanya, Israel.

Coming from across Israel, Canada, the United States, Western Europe and South and Central America, participants work with Massuah's multilingual staff, whose printed materials are used by educators around the world.

Much of Massuah's educational material has also been translated into Russian and Amharic for use by immigrants from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia, many of whom had no prior knowledge of the Holocaust.

Massuah is a teaching facility that focuses on the Holocaust, the years preceding it and its aftermath, providing an in-depth understanding of this devastation of European Jewry and of the impact it has had.

Hundreds of Canadian high school and university students have participated in Massuah seminars on their visits to Israel. During the school year, Massuah is host to thousands of Israeli students and new inductees to the Israeli Defence Forces who are sent there as part of their educational program. Massuah also regularly welcomes Jewish and non-Jewish educators from around the world.

Yonat Klar, a member of the Massuah teaching staff, presented her one-woman show on children of the Holocaust at several Ontario schools last year.

Massuah is now in the midst of a major expansion and renovation of its award-winning museum, a major part of which is the new exhibit, called The Eichmann Trial — Six Million Accusers.

Visitors to the exhibit will start with a walk through a reconstructed Israeli street on the eve of the trial, then view and discuss depictions of different aspects of the Holocaust as they unfolded through the trial, and will finally sit through an audio-visual presentation of the trial itself in a simulation of the actual courtroom.

The previous major Canadian project on behalf of the Institute was the development of Canada House, which contains the audio-visual centre, library and taping facilities and archives for videotapes of survivor testimonies.

Fundraising for the new project has been ongoing for several months. The fundraising campaign is being chaired by Alex Grossman, one of the founders of the Massuah Institute.

CJC delivers more than Judaism to camps

TORONTO — This year's Summer Camp Project of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region, not only delivered Judaic content programming, it also brought requested programs on multiculturalism and anti-racism to Jewish and non-Jewish camps across southern Ontario.

"It was very meaningful for our four-member team to help youngsters combat racism, and anti-Semitism," said project coordinator Janna Cohen, a fourth-year York University student who is training to be a teacher.

"The goal of our multicultural and anti-racism programming was to teach children about other cultures and heritages and to make them aware of how to combat discrimination in their own communities.

"Our programs on anti-racism and anti-Semitism stimulated discussion on appropriate ways to behave towards one another. Older youngsters said they thought that skin color and appearance are not important; it is what inside that counts. For younger kids, our program was about friendship and cooperation, and how to make someone feel welcome, no matter the accent or appearance."

Risa Gordon, supervisor of Pleasant Junior Day Camp in North York, praised the endeavor.

"The program on learning to appreciate one's friends was an action-packed, theme-oriented presentation," she said.

An evaluation from the Bloor Jewish Community Centre Day Camp called the program "well thought out."

Designed to convey importance of mitzvot, tzedakah

For 31 years, CJC, Ontario region, has offered this service free of charge, tailoring programs to meet the needs of camps in Ontario.

Human Resources Development Canada helped fund the program via a Student Career Placement grant, said Turack, Ontario region's director of community services and youth activities. The United Israel Appeal of Canada provided a grant to cover the costs of Israel programming.

The main goal of the Summer Camp Project is to educate and enhance the campers' understanding of Judaism and Israel, said Turack. "This year's program was designed to convey the importance of mitzvot (good deeds) and tzedakah (charity). As well, programs on Israel emphasized Zionist heroes, Israeli pioneers, and culture."

Under the direction of Cohen, the staff included York University students Orit Kahn, Ayala Wenner and Marni Dishy.

When arranging for camp visits, Cohen said, information was obtained about the staff and the ages and number of campers. Programs were tailored to ages ranging from 2½ to 16.

Junction Shul used as site for new series

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A very corporal ćast and crew and a not so corporal but menacing dybbuk recently "invaded" Knesseth Israel, the historic Junction Shul on Maria Street, for a two-day shoot contracted by Atlantis Films.

Canadian based Atlantis is currently producing Psi Factor: Chronicles of the Paranormal, a new 22-episode, hour-long science fiction series, to be launched on CanWest Global TV this fall. It will also be syndicated in the United States by Eyemark Entertainment, a unit of CBS.

The series, which is being filmed at various locations in and around Toronto, dramatizes stories inspired by actual files from OSIR, the Office of Scientific Investigation, a privately funded organization of scientists and researchers which investigates paranormal and unusual phenomena. Each story is different, but a core group of actors portraying a team of OSIR investigators appear regularly.

Host is Dan Aykroyd, whose lifelong interest in the paranormal translated into informed research and co-writing for Ghostbusters and Ghostbusters II.

At Knesseth Israel, a scene from The Transient, a show written for the series by Damian Kindler and directed by Giles Walker, is being filmed. According to the story, it is a summer evening, but inside the synagogue the atmosphere is tense and sinister. The camera dollies in on a dimly lit set where Rita Emmerich, a synagogue congregant (played by Dee Dee Langford), who is believed to be possessed by a dybbuk or demon, is undergoing the ancient rite of exorcism invoked by Rabbi Rothstein (Peter Dvorsky) in the presence of an OSIR team called in to investigate the woman's dangerously unsettling behavior.

As the rabbi intones the traditional Hebrew words, the woman starts to writhe uncontrollably and emits a rising, gurgling shriek.

Rabbi Rothstein, a modern scholar and dybbuk skeptic who has been persuaded against his will to perform the ceremony, suddenly becomes strangely afflicted and events move on to a startling climax.

Peter Dvorsky brings an unusual background to his role of rabbi. The son of Holocaust survivors who elected not to tell him he was Jewish, he learned of his roots in his late teens.

"It gives me a strange feeling, playing a rabbi," he said.

Yet Jack Schwartz, a lay chaplain at Toronto Hospital who coached Dvorsky in Hebrew, notes that he was a "quick study" and that the guttural ch sound seemed to come naturally. Schwartz also coached Jack Duffy, who plays the role of the cantor.

Executive producer James Nadler, a former entertainment lawyer, notes that the Junction Shul was chosen for The Transient because it is a historic building evocative of a time and place needed for this particular episode. It generates the right feeling, he said.

Cast and crew agreed to respect all requirements for working within an Orthodox synagogue, said congregation vice-president Harry Alexandroff, who added that he and his assistants "camped out" at the shul during the shooting.

Psi Factor, which will be distributed worldwide, has been contracted for one year, Nadler said. "We're confident it will do well."

Inline skating hockey league takes off

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If you were to ask drivers and pedestrians to name Canada's fastest growing summer sport, they'd probably be unanimous in muttering: it's those damn rollerbladers.

But not all rollerbladers — or in-line skaters, as they are also known — like to play in traffic or weave between sidewalk strollers. A growing number are joining summer roller hockey leagues, both as a recreational activity and to get a jump on their buddies when the ice hockey season starts again in the fall.

The Spring Inline Skate Hockey League (SISHL) is one of the roller hockey leagues in and around Toronto that has benefitted from the growing popularity of inline skating. Its client base has soared from 185 in year one to around 600 in this, its fourth year in business.

Brett and Devon Cranson are the teenage brother team behind the SISHL and with help from their father, Steven, and mother Lorie, they've turned their summertime avocation into a successful business with lots of upward growth potential.

Brett, 19, and Devon, 16, operate a spring/summer league in Toronto, another one later in the summer in Aurora and, for the first time, an inline hockey camp in Toronto.

Market research

The leagues are open to kids 7 to 18 years of age and participants are grouped according to age and ability.

So far, the young entrepreneurs have learned a lot about business. They've conducted market research (by handing out questionnaires at Toronto rinks), booked arenas, bought advertising, obtained insurance, hired referees, obtained jerseys and done all the various and sundrie activities that go into making a league work.

Their first season was a modest success, with 185 young bladers signing up for hockey at R.J. Clatworthy Arena.

Players were charged $85 for an eight-game season that included eight practices. In that first year, the Cransons earned only a little walking-around money but their entrepreneurial juices were sufficiently stimulated that they went back for more.

The next year, the league attracted 250 players, who paid up to $100 each; the third year they had more than 300 bladers paying up to $110; and in 1996, 385 youngsters shelled out up to $135 each to play in the Thornhill-based league.

A second league in Aurora that wrapped up in early August attracted more than 200 bladers in four age groups and 1996 marked the debut of a modest-sized roller hockey camp.

Though they won't say how much the venture earns, it's clearly an improvement over year one. "In the first year, the profit we made was enough," said Brett. "But if we thought about it now, it wouldn't be. We put a lot of work into it."

In their early teens the boys were already roller hockey enthusiasts themselves who used to play on the street all day long, upsetting some neighbors while themselves being upset by rain-outs.

Their mother, Lorie, who teaches a high school course in entrepreneurship, suggested they take their sporting passion to an indoor rink.

From that they got the idea of forming a league, but first they had to find out if others shared their passion for inline hockey. Their first marketing survey, asking kids at a Thornhill rink whether they'd play inline hockey in the summer, suggested there was a market for the sport.

For Brett and Devon, the entrepreneurial bug has bitten deep. "I love doing this stuff. I like working for myself. It's fun and I want to get involved in it, stay in it and make it bigger," said Brett, who plans to study sports administration in the commerce department at Laurentian University this year.

Devon is eventually aiming at a Master's degree in business. "I don't know if I want to continue with roller hockey, but I want to be an entrepreneur. I enjoy it a lot, having [our] own business."

Devon was recently one of two Ontario students among 325 from North America who attended a banquet in Sun Valley, Idaho sponsored by the American Academy of Achievement.

He was most impressed by the words of advice imparted by the keynote speaker: "'Do something you enjoy. Don't get stuck in a job you don't enjoy. It shouldn't be work, it should be something you like to do,'" Devon recalled the speaker saying.

The boys love their business so much, they expect it to expand to several locations next season.

Anti-government groups not seen as concern

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

WHISTLER, B.C. — Despite the rise of militant anti-government groups in the United States, such groups are not making much headway in Canada.

That was the consensus of the handful of Canadians who attended the 15th annual conference here of the International Society for Individual Liberties (ISIL), an American-based organization which contends that big government is intruding too deeply into people's lives.

One of the speakers was Vancouver Reform MP Herb Grubel, who asked, what "all the fuss" was about, after Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region (CJC-P) urged him not to attend because, Congress said, the conference was featuring extreme right-wing speakers.

Delegates included militia supporters, anti-tax protesters, advocates of marijuana legalization — all united by the belief that government is corrupt and plans to rob citizens of their liberty.

The solution, the meeting recommended, is to take children out of school, stop paying taxes and organize such tools as the Internet "to help seize our liberties back from the police state."

The Westcoast Coalition for Human Dignity (WCHD) of Vancouver, commenting on the conference, said, "Effective opposition to hate-motivated movements and organizations requires informed, collaborative community response."

WCHD says it endeavors to build alliances between individuals and organizations promoting equality, social justice and human rights.

WCHD issued a kit (made available by Congress to The CJN), that provided information about organizations belonging to the ISIL. One item said that Charles Duke, a Republican Colorado state senator who was one of the conference speakers, has been featured on a radio program directed by the Jubilee, a newspaper "filled with anti-Semitic, racist and anti-government rhetoric."

The literature says Duke has shared a stage with Eugene Schroder, whose involvement with the Christian Patriots began in 1980 with the racist Posse Commitatus. Schroder attended a paramilitary training camp and by 1982, was conducting his own bomb-making trainings.

WCHD says the networking between Canadian neo-conservatives and the U.S. far-right is "a dangerous trend in Canadian politics. Their anti-government rhetoric is shrouded with anti-Jewish conspiracy theories and advocates radical, vigilante forms of 'justice.' "

Reform MP concerns CJC

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, has expressed concern that Reform party MP Herb Grubel, a Vancouver member of Parliament, participated in the 1996 conference of the International Society for Individual Liberty (ISIL) in Whistler, "which provided a platform for some speakers known for extreme right, intolerant views."

The ISIL conference held during the week of Aug. 19 was promoted by organizers as an opportunity for "freedom lovers and leading scholars of the world to develop peaceful solutions to the political mess we find ourselves in today."

Two of the scheduled speakers were Americans Charles Duke and Larry Dodge, known for their far-right views.

CJC Pacific region chair Dr. Michael Elterman said, "We are surprised that Herb Grubel would have his good name associated with an event that, as part of its program, promotes views that should be abhorrent to the Reform party and all elected officials."

Elterman said Congress alerted Grubel, in writing and in advance, of its concerns that an elected member of Parliament would lend credibility to a forum at which well known American anti-government and right-wing militia supporters were among the featured speakers.

According to a Congress release, Duke is a Colorado state senator. Quoting the Denver Post, the release says that "if America's militia movement has a political general, he's most likely to be Charles R. Duke."

Dodge, another conference speaker, is co-founder of the Fully Informed Jury Association (FIJA), Congress said. "Sometimes referred to as Christian Patriots, Constitutionalists or Freemen, the Patriots believe in monolithic conspiracies directed against white Christians. A Montana newspaper reported that FIJA activists distributed pamphlets to state legislators, which complained that the race which settled America and once were its only citizens is being destroyed through integration, interracial marriage, affirmative action, abortion, etc."

A release from the Westcoast Coalition for Human Dignity says the conference "introduces extremist American political figures who promote vigilante and potentially violent strategies as legitimate means of citizen assent. The presence of elected officials and established Canadian organizations legitimizes and lends support to the political agendas of radical, extremist American activities."

Winnipeg CJA launches campaign

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG – This year's annual Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign has several innovations.

For the first time, a member of the city's Council of Rabbis has been appointed to the CJA cabinet.

"Not only will we get a rabbinic perspective," says CJA director Gerry Koffman, "but we will also have the rabbis helping to get our message out to their congregations."

Other new representatives in the cabinet are a member of the Jewish Students Association at the university and the community's Young Leadership Division. There is also a new Golden Givers Division this year to focus on retirees, and a marketing committee to help sell the campaign in the community.

In recent years, the campaign has kicked off with an evening of entertainment and information for the community at large. This year, Koffman says, organizers will have a celebratory evening to thank the community and recognize supporters after the campaign is concluded.

This year's campaign began on Sept. 8, with Super Sunday. For the first time, that day included a trade show of small and home-based businesses at the YMHA Jewish Community Centre in conjunction with the phoning campaign.

The object of the Super Sunday Market, Koffman says, is to give volunteers something else to do in the building after they finish their calls and thus keep up the sense of activity and energy.

"The message that we are trying to get across to the community is that the CJA touches the lives of everyone in the community in one way or another," Koffman says.

"It is important that there should be some fun in fundraising. We want our fundraisers to feel a certain level of Jewish consciousness-raising and fulfilment. The message is also that every gift counts. Collectively, we can ensure that the campaign and the community are successful."

There will be a number of follow-up mini-telethons to Super Sunday. For the first time, a number of different community organizations, both CJA beneficiaries and non-beneficiaries, have volunteered to provide the manpower for these.

JWV seeks new members

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritime Correspondent

HALIFAX — Sam Pasternack is on a mission.

The national commander of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada wants to recruit younger members to each and every post across the country. "Unless we develop a core, we'll be a footnote in history. The Jewish people are people of long memory. We consider that we all stood at Mount Sinai to receive the Commandments and we were all in the trenches during he war. That's why it's vitally important the associates carry on."

Pasternack spoke to about 50 veterans and associates at a Halifax breakfast recently, reminding younger audience members that "veterans have seen the terror of hatred unbridled. We all have to carry that memory and message forth. Attrition is taking its natural toll and that's why we need younger blood. Then future members will be able to say they spoke to people who were there."

Pasternack, a retired Toronto retailer born of immigrant parents enlisted in the Canadian forces in 1941 at age 17. After training, he served in the Northwest Air Command.

"I enlisted because I was aware of what was happening and it was our chance to get in our innings," he said.

He is proud that he was one of 16,000 enlisted Jews in World War II, 10 percent of the Canadian Jewish population, and higher per capita than the national Canadian average.

"In speeches [he makes 20 to 25 a year], I try to impress that Canadian Jews, contrary to public thought, did participate in World War II. We certainly have our deaths and casualty lists."

As national commander, Pasternack coordinates the eight posts and 1,500 veterans across Canada in projects that, he said, "are as important to Jewish communities at large as they are to the veterans. We look out for the welfare of the veterans but also fight bigotry, racism and help root out war criminals. Anything that affects people of every faith is our concern."

Longtime Atlantic Canada Post commander Gar Meltzer of Saint John, N.B. said it is difficult to get veterans out for ceremonial functions. "They want to forget. That's our biggest battle — to keep the memory alive so people in the future will never forget our contribution. We have 25 associate members in our region now and I'm proud of that."

Pasternack has been national commander for four years, after serving 12 years as Toronto Post commander. "Only a meshugenah would do it," he said with a laugh.

But he has received the commemorative medal for the 125th anniversary of confederation (1992) and was named an honorary deputy chief of police in the city of Toronto in 1994.

"That was a great thrill. I was never prouder than when then Toronto chief, Bill MacCormack, mentioned the Jewish War veterans of Canada in front of a crowd of 25,000 at Skydome and they all applauded."

ARABS TO LAUNCH DIPLOMATIC THRUST

Israel is anticipating a two-pronged diplomatic assault in the United Nations spearheaded by Jordan and Egypt.

Foreign Minister Abba Eban said the Israeli delegation would expose the full story of atrocities and desecration during Jordan's 19-year occupation of East Jerusalem if Jordan raised the question of Jerusalem in the Security Council. Egypt, meanwhile, was said to be planning to seek a pro-Arab "interpretation" of the Security Council Resolution 242, seeking consensus that the resolution requires total Israeli withdrawal behind the pre-June 1967 armistice lines.

Communities link to help Israel

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Vancouver and San Francisco Jewish communities are joining forces to extend a helping hand to communities in Israel, says Drew Staffenberg, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV).

The alliance is part of Partnership 2000, in which Diaspora communities are partnered with an Israeli region to formulate and implement development plans. Partnership 2000 is an initiative of the Jewish Agency, United Jewish Appeal and Keren Hayesod.

One of the main goals of the project is to move from the "Diaspora helping Israel" approach to "Diaspora and Israel working together." It creates a two-way link between Israelis and Diaspora Jews who work together as equals, says Staffenberg.

Unlike the earlier Project Renewal, which linked specific Israeli city areas with Diaspora cities, Partnership 2000 will not rely on a separate campaign. It will promote programs in both rural and urban Israel, not just urban; deal with large areas, not just a single neighborhood; combine economic development and share educational opportunities, not just social and cultural programs and community facilities.

Vancouver and San Francisco leaders will be part of a Partnership 2000 stearing committee being set up with an Israel group of urban and community leaders and experts in education, economic development and tourism, says Staffenberg.

In other JFGV news, the annual Combined Jewish Appeal Plus campaign is getting under way. Under the "plus" system, each contributor who makes an increased gift over the CJA 95 pledge, may designate 50 percent of the increase to agencies or areas of service of his/her choice.

The Women's Division campaign opens with a top gifts dinner at the Four Seasons Hotel on Oct. 2 at which Julia Koschitzky of Toronto, chair of the Keren Hayesod world board of trustees, will be the keynote speaker.

Shared sanctuary opens

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

WATERLOO — Canada's first shared house of worship was opened here last week in the atmosphere of harmony and interfaith cooperation its organizers were seeking.

The Cedars will be unique in this country: a facility split between Temple Shalom, a Reform congregation serving about 55 family members in the area, and Westminster United Church, with 90 families.

Organizers hold out the structure as a model of what cooperation between Christians and Jews can accomplish. Some go so far as to say they believe it's the first time in the world that Jews and Christians have jointly designed, built and shared a worship facility.

Last Thursday night, over 250 Jews and non-Jews sat side by side in the $1.4-million building, and together sang Psalm 113 and Hinei matov umanayim, shevet achim gam yachad (Here is what is pleasant and good, that brothers and sisters sit together.)

Speaker after speaker, including Charles Rothschild, head of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, lauded the effort as an example of partnership between the faiths.

Waterloo Mayor Brian Turnbull called the project "a tremendous accomplishment ... a lesson to the rest of the world on how to work together."

Apart from the main sanctuary, The Cedars will house a community hall, a kitchen, offices and a nursery. Plans call for religious education classrooms and possibly a gym — all to be called The Cedars Worship and Community Centre, at 543 Beechwood Dr. in Waterloo.

But it's the adjoining sanctuary that is ingenious in its simplicity. The twin peaks of the blond oak ceiling are said to symbolize two different peoples. The temple's Aron Kodesh faces east, while the church's congregation sits facing west.

The church's sanctuary seats up to 300, while about 90 can gather for synagogue services. But a retractable wall between the two can be opened for either congregation to use the entire area if necessary. Moveable pews can be arranged to face either direction.

The sole outward sign of any religious artifact is the temple's eternal light. The Aron Kodesh recesses into the wall, and the church's cross is removeable.

The dedication of the temple's sefer Torah took place last erev Shabbat, while the church sanctuary was dedicated last Sunday.

The story of how the two congregations came together has almost become part of local lore: In 1992, two Waterloo neighbors, Jim Robinson, then chair of the church's building committee, and Mark Pancer, then temple president, commiserated over their backyard fence about their places of worship. The church had been holding services in a local school gym, while the temple had been renting space in a church basement in Kitchener.

"When we realized that both congregations were looking for new, more permanent quarters," recalls Robinson, "we said, 'Hey, maybe we can do something together!' "

Thus began three years of working together on the design and construction. The building is owned by Westminster United. Temple Shalom will hold a five-year lease, with an option to buy a half interest in The Cedars.

It was also three years ago that the area was going through some religious tensions. British Holocaust denier David Irving had spoken in Kitchener, a local stereo shop owned by an Irving supporter-was being picketed by local Jews and Christians, and a house belonging to a Jewish activist burned down in a suspicious fire.

"Some people felt strongly about that," Temple Shalom president Bob Chodos told The CJN, "so this is a way of making a statement."

PM denies he intends to curb Supreme Court

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has denied that he is contemplating moves to curb the powers of Israel's Supreme Court.

In an official clarification issued recently, the Prime Minister's Office said comments Netanyahu made to this effect that were published by the Israeli daily Ma'ariv had been misunderstood by the paper.

Netanyahu said his comments had been theoretical, but his quick effort to squelch the quoted remarks demonstrated the sensitivity of the issue.

The issue is currently at the heart of a major political controversy in Israel.

The Orthodox parties, along with some Likud members, feel that the Supreme Court, and particularly Chief Justice Aharon Barak, are too "activist" and liberal in their interpretation of laws.

Religious Jews have assailed Barak about his rulings recognizing gay rights and women's rights.

But the hostility toward the chief justice boiled over with the court's recent decision to keep Bar Ilan Street, a main Jerusalem thoroughfare that passes through religious neighborhoods, open to traffic on the Sabbath.

The court's ruling overturned a decision by Minister of Transportation Yitzhak Levy of the National Religious Party to close the street during hours of prayer on the Sabbath and religious holidays. An article last month in the Yated Ne'eman newspaper, published by the Orthodox Degal HaTorah Party, blasted Barak as a "dangerous enemy" of religious Jews.

In recent weeks, Barak and other justices have received telephone threats.

Security has been stepped up around the Jerusalem home of Barak, who recently said, according to a court source, that he was determined to preserve the rule of law in Israel and that "no individual will scare him."

Netanyahu has urged tough police action to apprehend those issuing the threats, saying he would not tolerate "lawlessness" in Israeli society.

But some members of the legal community fault him for not speaking out forcefully enough against religious and conservative politicians who are campaigning for a reduction in the Supreme Court's powers.

The haredi community has long complained that the Supreme Court issues rulings that contravene the beliefs and needs of Orthodox Jews.

The Orthodox parties are seeking to have greater say in the appointments of Supreme Court justices and want greater powers for the Knesset to circumvent the high court's rulings.

Ma'ariv quoted Netanyahu as saying he had been meeting with "eminent jurists, rabbis and academics" to discuss the separation of powers between the court and the Knesset.

Netanyahu told the paper there was "no need for quotas" in an effort to appoint judges of various ideological stripes.

But he added that it was legitimate to consider the question of the court's sphere of authority in relation to the legislature.

"This is a fundamental issue, by no means simple, which we have to deal with as the state matures," Ma'ariv quoted the premier as saying.

"We will not be able to avoid it, and I intend to work out my own opinion on it in the months ahead."

Opposition spokespersons, among them former justice minister David Liba'i, immediately charged that Netanyahu was giving in to Orthodox pressures to cut down the Supreme Court's power and that he was thereby dealing a serious blow to the rule of law in Israel.

Palestinian state rejected

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – "There never will be a Palestinian state between the sea and the Jordan," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu vowed before the Likud central committee last week.

He also pledged that Jerusalem will never be redivided, that Jewish settlement "will remain forever and prosper" and that his government will move towards peace with security "at the proper speed, without reckless haste."

A confident Netanyahu defended his meeting with Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat and he reviewed his first 80 days in office.

His two main party adversaries – Ariel Sharon and Ze'ev Begin – stopped short of an outright attack upon him. Begin was especially incensed at Netanyahu's repeated statements that those who opposed his meeting with Arafat should not have entered his government, and that those ministers who actively oppose the government's line would be fired if need be.

But Netanyahu weathered the expected storm in the central committee without too much trouble. The only frontal attack came from MK Uzi Landau, and the often volatile committee was generally well-behaved, with only some heckling and an occasional boo. Netanyahu asserted that he only agreed to meet with Arafat after a series of messages relayed to the PA had been received and understood.

"We will not agree to terror from the areas under PA control," he said. Our message was that we will react very differently from the Labor government.

Rabbis may move

By HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Plans by Israel's two chief rabbis to leave their offices in downtown Jerusalem's Hechal Shlomo building may be scuttled if the country's two deputy religious affairs ministers have their way.

The deputy ministers, Rabbi Aryeh Gamliel of Shas and Yigal Bibi of the National Religious Party, issued a joint statement last week calling on the Chief Rabbinate to reconsider its decision to leave Hechal Shlomo for a government office building.

The current headquarters was built in the 1950s. The Chief Rabbinate has complained that the rent is too high and that there is not enough working space.

However, the deputy ministers said that even if the rent is high, the stature of the chief rabbis would be lowered if they sat in an "ordinary" office building.

They said it was important to build a new building for the chief rabbis, similar to the Supreme Court, but that until then, the rabbis should not leave Hechal Shlomo.

JERUSALEM – Fourteen months after a forest fire destroyed more than 3,200 acres of woodland in the forested hills near Jerusalem, another blaze has claimed an additional 500 acres of forest and several buildings in the kibbutz of Kiryat Anavim.

Complaining about the poor response to the recent fire, kibbutz residents and others living in the affected area outside Jerusalem are leading a vociferous outcry against what they describe as the negligence, apathy and inefficiency of the firefighting services.

They claimed that the report and recommendations of a blue-ribbon inquiry committee set up to study the disastrous July 1995 fire have been largely ignored.

According to a preliminary investigation, the fire began in the Arab village of Abu Gosh when wind carried the flames from burning garbage.

As the fire spread, black smoke engulfed the area and reached the main Tel Aviv-Jerusalem highway. Thirteen people required medical attention for smoke inhalation, but there were no serious injuries.

Interior Minister Eli Suissa has ordered a new inquiry – both into the weekend blaze and into the apparent failure of the authorities to learn the lessons of last year's fire.

President Ezer Weizman, in a grim-faced visit to the scene, urged the air force to purchase special firefighting planes and hold them in readiness for such events.

A former air force commander, Weizman said the Israel Air Force's Sikorsky helicopters, which lug large tubs of water from nearby reservoirs and dump them over a blaze, are by no means the most advanced airborne firefighting technique.

But most of the residents' criticism was directed at the ground-based fire services, headquartered at Beit Shemesh, at the foot of the Jerusalem hills.

Kiryat Anavim residents claimed it took hours for the fire officers to appreciate the strength of the spreading blaze and to call up fire-engines from Jerusalem and elsewhere.

"They could have stopped it when it was still small," kibbutz member Chava Abrahams said, surveying the charred wreckage of her mother's home.

Meir Wiesel, chair of the Mateh Yehuda regional council, charged that "none of the recommendations made after last year's fire was carried out in practice."

These recommendations included beefing up firefighting services in both material and manpower, cutting wider safety swathes through forest tracts and maintaining better watch for fires, especially during hot weather.

The village hardest hit in last year's fire was Shoresh. This time, its inhabitants sought to offer shelter and comfort to those forced out of their homes in Kiryat Anavim.

'Protocols' published in Croatia

By ALISSA KAPLAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK – The publication in Croatia of The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a notorious anti-Semitic forgery, is particularly troubling to some because of that country's role in the Holocaust.

The surfacing of the Protocols anywhere is cause for concern, Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, said in a telephone interview here this week.

But it is even more so in a country such as Croatia, which has a "history of compliance and complicity" in the deaths of Jews during World War II, he said.

The Croatian translation of the Protocols was published a week ago and a quarter of the initial 2,000-copy print run reportedly already has been sold.

The tract, which contains a series of 24 lectures by the so-called "Elders" on plans and techniques for subjugating the world and establishing a Jewish state, first appeared in 1905 Russia and was printed by the government press.

Since that time, it has been appeared around the world.

Foxman also said he was concerned by the appearance of the forgery in Croatia because of its head of state, nationalist Franjo Tudjman.

Last year, Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal accused Croatia of reviving ideas and icons from the fascist Ustashe regime that governed the country during World War II.

After the German invasion of Yugoslavia in April 1941, Croatia was organized as an independent state allied with Germany. In the next four years, Croats stripped the Jews of all their property and eventually killed most of them in local camps, including the infamous Jasenovac death camp.

Among other things, Tudjman wrote a book in 1989 minimizing the Holocaust. He apologized in 1994 for the work's anti-Semitic sections. He has also been quoted as saying that Jews are "selfish, crafty, unreliable, miserly and underhanded."

Slavko Goldstein, a prominent member of Croatia's small Jewish community, reportedly said that he could not accuse the publisher of anti-Semitism, but rather of recklessness and failure to explain the tract adequately in the preface.

Non-Jewish Croats have also criticized the book's publication.

Israel & the Jewish World

Disadvantaged people learn to help themselves

By LEORA EREN FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM – Three afternoons a week, Zehava Cohen's tools of the trade are a mop and pail. But in the morning, the cleaning woman from one of Jerusalem's poorer neighborhoods uses another set of tools at her second job: solving problems for dozens of people who walk in off the street.

Zehava Cohen is a volunteer at the Jerusalem branch of Community Advocacy, a non-profit organization modelled after Montreal's Project Genesis, now in its 20th year.

Like Project Genesis, founded by McGill social work professor Jim Torczyner, Community Advocacy is about helping disadvantaged people to help themselves. Since the Israeli program began in 1992, it has recruited some 75 volunteers who act as advocates for over 6,000 Israelis at storefront sites in Jerusalem, Beersheva and, most recently, Acre.

Community Advocacy – funded by UIA-Canada and the Montreal Jewish Community Foundation, as well as the New Israel Fund and Abraham Fund – helps residents solve problems ranging from obtaining a disability allowance to getting repairs done on public housing. The goal: informing people of their rights and helping them take the steps to obtain them.

Political lobby group

Community Advocacy also acts as a political lobby group which seeks changes in housing, education, health care and other social legislation.

The Jerusalem office where Cohen sits is located in the Katamonim, an eyesore of a neighborhood made up of long blocks of concrete housing in various stages of decay. The organization's office is a cramped one-floor building with a corrugated iron roof at a noisy intersection. The storefront is in the heart of the neighborhood, the door literally opening up onto the street, making it easy for residents to just drop by.

On this blistering Sunday in August, a woman named Stella has stopped by to see if Cohen – who happens to be manning the front desk today – can help her. Stella can hardly stand on her swollen feet. The 65-year-old Jerusalemite tries to get up, leaning heavily on her cane, but turns white and collapses into her chair. For six months, she has been waiting for various government authorities to make good their promise and provide her with transportation to the hospital for medical treatment three times a week.

"When I take the bus, I often fall or faint," she explains, wiping the sweat from her brow. "And on my 900-shekel monthly allowance ($300 US) from National Insurance I can't afford to take taxis." In the hope of speeding things up, Stella, who suffers from a host of medical problems, turned to Community Advocacy.

Cohen is already familiar with Stella's case. "How are you today?" she asks and patiently listens to Stella's story, interjecting now and then to ask pertinent questions. Cohen calls the municipality-appointed social worker who has been assigned to Stella. The social worker says she will look into the delay in arranging transportation. It's a first step.

For Cohen, helping others is a relatively new role.

"Not long ago, I couldn't solve my own problems," admits the Katamonim resident who until a year ago worked solely as a cleaning woman. "When the city was slow in authorizing a reduction on my property tax bill, I couldn't bring myself to make the necessary phone calls. I came to Community Advocacy, where a friend of mine was working, and asked her to take care of it for me. That was three years ago. Today I help others solve their problems.

"Most of our volunteers are past consumers of our service," says Barbara Epstein, director of the program. "Anyone we help – who seems to have some potential – is asked to consider becoming a volunteer."

That is how Esther Hayut, a 68-year-old grandmother, ended up devoting one morning a week to working at the Jerusalem storefront a block away from her home.

When Hayut returned ill from a family vacation in the United States, her insurance company refused to pay for the two days she had spent hospitalized abroad. Before long, the American hospital was sending her interest-linked bills totalling $7,000. Community Advocacy's lawyer took on her case, eventually passing it on to another lawyer. After a full year of correspondence, the bill was finally settled by the insurance company.

Hayut was grateful. "I was treated with such care at Community Advocacy I felt I had to do something in return," she says.

All volunteers take a training course that teaches them basic information about social services – eligibility criteria, agencies involved, the people to contact at each agency – as well as working methods, including how to receive clients, develop a rapport and deal with a government agency. The course is capped by an in-service training period.

Training local residents like Cohen to work at Community Advocacy has several advantages over hiring "professionals," says Epstein.

"The goal of the program isn't just to solve particular problems, but to empower people – to teach them to solve their own problems."

It's also more effective. "It's easier to ask for help from someone who is a lot like you," says Epstein, noting that many of the volunteers and clients are friends or neighbors. "If you want to make information accessible, it helps to speak the same language as your clients."

In an effort to do that literally, Community Advocacy offers services in Hebrew, Arabic and Russian. Notices in Russian-language newspapers brought a wave of new immigrants to the storefront, where Russian-speaking volunteers are available. Israeli Arabs from the adjacent neighborhood of Beit Sefafa are more reluctant to walk into the office. Instead, Arab social work students from the Hebrew University make house calls as part of Community Advocacy's outreach program.

In addition to solving individual problems, Community Advocacy mobilizes residents to fight for changes in national social policy. Last year, a concerted campaign bore fruit when the finance minister agreed to a major budget change: allowing a 50 percent reduction on medication for pensioners living solely on National Insurance allowances.

For the first time in its history, the Egged bus cooperative will soon have a route running through the Arab village of Beit Sefafa, which is part of the Jerusalem Municipality. That too is the result of a Community Advocacy effort which culminated in a petition, signed by 300 villagers, demanding public transportation.

Another accomplishment is stopping schools from penalizing children whose parents cannot pay for school books.

The organization – which is apolitical – is now waging new struggles in the aftermath of the Netanyahu government's budget cuts, many of which affect the weaker segments of society.

Behind all of these public battles is a more subtle attempt to change Israeli culture by introducing concepts like social rights, volunteerism and empowerment. If empowerment is a buzz word in North America, the Hebrew version, ha'atzamah, is not even listed in most dictionaries – let alone heard in conversations. Nor is volunteerism deeply rooted in Israel.

Change Israeli culture

"When I first came here 20 years ago," recalls the American-born Epstein, "to volunteer meant to be a freier – a sucker. Today it is acquiring a different connotation. It's become a way of enhancing one's status and boosting one's dignity. We're trying to reinforce that."

For some, the storefront in the Katamonim is still an enigma. "People often mistake us for a real estate office or a branch of City Hall," says Epstein. "When we explain that we deal with rights, they immediately assume we mean civil rights – that we defend homosexuals or Arabs or other discriminated groups. The concept of social rights like housing, education and medical care to which everyone is entitled is still a novelty."

For people who have been evicted from apartments, had their telephones disconnected or their television service cut, the law is no friend. In this respect, Community Advocacy also offers a different experience. Says Epstein: "We show people, often for the first time, that the law can also work for them."

Iraqi crisis ends on ambivalent note

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

The crisis in Iraq ended last week on an ambivalent note.

Once again, Iraq was cut down to size militarily by the United States. But Saddam Hussein, the supreme ruler of Iraq since 1979, emerged defiant and uncowed from the encounter.

No one knows when he may strike again. Iraq, with its ambitions of regaining its status as a regional power, remains a source of enormous instability.

The crisis began on Aug. 31, with an Iraqi armored thrust into the Kurdish safe haven north of the 36th parallel in Iraq, which is protected by the United States, Britain and France. The Iraqis were invited there by a Kurdish faction normally hostile to Baghdad.

In reaction, the United States launched back-to-back Tomahawk Cruise missile attacks at Iraq's air defence system in the south. Once again, Iraq miscalculated, suffering a humiliating drubbing.

But the punishment meted out to Iraq by the United States was not as strategically important as Washington's unilateral decision to expand the air exclusion zone in southern Iraq from the 32nd parallel to the 33rd parallel, and to suspend a recent United Nations agreement allowing Iraq to sell limited quantities of oil on the world market.

With one bold stroke, the United States put Iraq in its place, tightening the screws of its containment policy against Saddam Hussein.

As a result, much of Iraqi territory is now off-limits to Iraq's air force. This means that Iraq's capacity to threaten its neighbors in the future has been significantly reduced. And, of course, Iraq has temporarily forfeited the right to export $4 billion (US) worth of petroleum annually to purchase food and medical supplies for its long-suffering population.

So for now, the UN sanctions that have crippled Iraq since its ill-conceived 1990 invasion of Kuwait remain firmly in place. Iraq must be disappointed. It had been working ceaselessly to loosen the sanctions which are strangling its once-thriving economy.

For the United States, the crisis — the latest in a series stretching back several years — starkly underlined an unpalatable fact:the grand coalition it had so painstakingly assembled in 1990 to confront and defang Iraq lies in tatters.

Arab countries such as Egypt, Jordan (which was neutral in the Gulf War), Saudi Arabia and Syria were decidedly lukewarm to President Bill Clinton's draconian method of dealing with Iraq.

Still more disheartening, Turkey — which is now governed by an Islamic regime — refused to let the United States launch the raids from its territory.

Only Kuwait, the victim of past Iraqi aggression, offered unequivocable support.

France and Russia — key members of the old coalition — expressed grave misgivings as well. The only nations which lined up solidly behind the United States were Britain, Germany, Canada, Japan and Israel (which was hit by 39 Iraqi Scuds in the Gulf War).

Iraq, having failed to split the coalition in 1991, will doubtless try to break it down even further in the months ahead. Iraq will exploit every opportunity to sow dissension within allied ranks.

The Kurds, an ancient people scattered throughout the Middle East, are at the root of the current tension. Persecuted by all the countries in which they reside, notably Iraq, Iran and Turkey, the Kurds themselves are deeply and bitterly divided.

They brought the latest crisis upon themselves by their incessant feuding. Two rival Kurdish factions, one backed by Iran, were locked in fighting for control of Erbil, which is in the no-fly zone north of the 36th parallel. The leader of the other faction appealed to Iraq for help, and Saddam Hussein jumped into the fray.

The Kurdish enclave was established by the United States, Britain and France in 1991 in the wake of Iraq's ignominious defeat in the Gulf War. Since then, Iraq has tried to recover this segment of its territory.

To justify its military action, the United States claimed that Iraq had breached a 1991 UN resolution demanding an end of Iraq's repression of the Kurds. But critics scoffed, claiming that the Clinton administration was playing presidential politics.

The no-fly zones were designed to protect Kurds in Iraq from Baghdad's wrath and to create a cordon sanitaire between Iraq and its neighbors, notably Kuwait and Saudi Arabia.

The Kurds, and the Shi'ites, staged unsuccessful revolts against Baghdad's authority in March 1991. The minority Sunni government in Iraq crushed these uprisings, touching off an exodus of millions of Kurds to Turkey and Iran. To lure the Kurds back to their homes, Western countries set up a Kurdish enclave.

Baghdad has repeatedly attempted to assert its influence there, and although Iraq has withdrawn from Erbil, the battle is far from over.

Indeed, it may only have begun.

The Week in Israel

Sept. 2

• A $42-million (US) bypass road linking southern Jerusalem to Jewish settlements in the Etzion Bloc was inaugurated. The road comprises two tunnels and a long bridge.

• President Ezer Weizman launched a campaign to promote tolerance among secular and religious Israelis. Under the project, postcards are being sent to Israeli homes during the Rosh Hashanah holiday period asking people to sign them in support of tolerance.

Sept. 3

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu sought to assure Israelis that they faced no threat of Iraqi retaliation consequence of the U.S. missile strike against Iraq.

• Foreign Minister David Levy met with the Russian ambassador to Israel to discuss the transfer of deeds of Jerusalem properties from the former Soviet Union to Russia.

Sept. 4

• The High Court of Justice rejected a petition from the acting mayor of Jerusalem to close Bar Ilan Street on Shabbat and on the holidays. The Court said there was no justification to lift the order keeping the street open to traffic pending the report of a special commission.

Sept. 5

• The media reported that U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher would meet in London on the weekend with Foreign Minister David Levy in advance of Netanyahu's upcoming meeting in Washington with President Bill Clinton.

Sept. 6

• Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai announced to the press that a previously scheduled meeting with Yasser Arafat would likely proceed the following week. Among the key items to be discussed is the issue of troop redeployment from Hebron.

Jewish community rejects Hebron plan

By EVELYN GORDON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon has prepared his own plan for redeployment in Hebron, but the Jewish community there has flatly rejected it.

Sharon's plan would actually give more territory to the Palestinian Authority than is called for under the current agreement with the PA.

Ariel Sharon

As things stand now, some 16,000 Palestinians in Hebron are slated to remain under Israeli rule. Under Sharon's plan, the number would be reduced to about 2,000.

In exchange however, the plan calls for massive building and development of the Jewish settlement in Hebron, enabling some 3,000 additional people to move there.

There are currently around 450 Jews in Hebron.

Sharon's plan would also allow the IDF to conduct patrols and maintain lookout posts on sites overlooking the Jewish part of the city, even though these areas will be officially controlled by the PA.

The IDF would also have the right to enter any part of Hebron in pursuit of terrorists or to prevent a terror attack. These are all rights the IDF would not have under the exisiting agreement.

Finally, the plan calls for a wall separating Jewish and Arab Hebron, and a new road connecting Kiryat Arba with the Jewish areas of the city.

Jewish residents of Hebron last week strongly rejected the plan.

"With all due respect to Sharon, this plan is a very serious mistake," said community spokesman Noam Arnon. "It would create a strangulated Jewish ghetto, surrounded by enemies. And the army would not be able to protect the residents, because terrorists would control the high places."

Sharon's call for increased Jewish settlement in the city is no compensation, because there would be no room to expand, he added.

Arnon stressed the community is especially opposed to setting up a "Jewish ghetto," which is what Sharon's plan to build a wall would do, he said.

Meanwhile, the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza had mixed reaction to Sharon's plan.

Deputy council chair and Ma'ale Adumim Mayor Benny Kashriel enthusiastically supported the plan, saying he will urge the entire council to adopt it.

Mayor of Jerusalem facing criminal indictment

By EVELYN GORDON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Attorney General Michael Ben-Yair is going ahead with plans to indict Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, after Olmert's lawyer failed to convince him at a hearing last week that an indictment was unmerited.

The draft indictment charges Olmert with aggravated fraud, falsifying corporate documents, two violations of the tax code, and violating the Party Funding Law by making a false declaration to the state comptroller. All of the charges relate to the Likud's 1988 election campaign, during which Olmert served as party treasurer.

According to the draft indictment, Olmert told Yona Peled – one of the heads of a non-profit organization doing fundraising for the party – to solicit money from businesses, and in exchange give them fictitious receipts indicating that the money was spent on advertising. Peled did so, and the Likud thereby raised NIS 913,707 ($402,000).

This scheme violated the law in two ways. First, campaign contributions from businesses are illegal. Second, the fictitious receipts enabled the companies to take tax deductions for the donations as if they were legitimate business expenses.

Olmert also omitted this sum from the report he later filed with State Comptroller Miriam Ben-Porat, thereby deceiving her into giving the party a clean bill of health for its finances. This enabled the Likud to receive the remainder of its campaign funding – NIS 2.148 million ($950,000) – from the government.

Peled and eight others involved in the affair, including Olmert's co-treasurer, Menahem Atzmon, were indicted in 1991. Olmert was not indicted at that time.

A new year and a new start

scholars of the Sanhedrin or with the holy men of the priesthood. Rather, it went with the little children. This concept is as stirring as it is powerful. For it suggests that from within the tiny, precious souls of our children are the eternal sparks, the inspiration, that can ignite in us flames of goodness, of justice, of mercy and of responsibility.

The great chassidic master, the Magid of Dubno, felt the same way. He believed that the outpouring of a child's heart was capable of penetrating the windows of Heaven.

As Hannah before him, the photo of Tzadekov proclaims tearfully: "For this child did I pray..." But no less tearfully, the photo of Lena, his daughter, inverts the prayer, and with Hannah-like gratitude also says: "For this father did I pray." Undoubtedly, it was through heaven's window, that her prayer found its metaphysical mark. Their reunion enchantingly fulfils God's consolation to Rachel: "Let your voice no longer cry, nor your eyes shed any more tears."

Tzadekov, Lena and their family have a new beginning. In truth, so do we all at this time of year.

Barak to throw hat into Labor ring

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Ehud Barak was expected to formally announce his intention to challenge former prime minister Shimon Peres for the party leadership at a press conference this week, according to Labor sources.

Since the elections, Barak has unofficially placed himself in the running for Labor's top spot, although it wasn't always clear that his primary adversary was Peres. Most party pundits saw the showdown as being between Barak and MK Haim Ramon.

That scenario, however, assumed that Peres was about to step down. That Peres chose not to do so was seen as working against Barak and helping Ramon, who has an interest in postponing the leadership bout as long as possible, to let memories of Peres' election defeat – for which Ramon is seen as largely responsible – recede.

Meanwhile, not only has Peres failed to step down, but Labor has been rife with rumors that Peres might seek the party's renomination for the elections scheduled for the year 2000.

As a result of these rumors, the sources said, Barak has decided that it serves no purpose to politely wait until Peres steps down. Hence the party now expects Barak to officially declare that he will contest the leadership, although the actual vote will not be held for a year.

Quiet revolution taking place in IDF

'We reflect society'

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – There is a quiet revolution taking place among mid-level officers, and the army appears to be happy about it.

Zionism and an ideological sense of mission are no longer the decisive factors in staying in uniform. For today's majors and lieutenant colonels, signing on is a career move. The military is a job, and a well paying one at that.

"I see it as a challenge. I think I chose a profession which is very interesting to me and one I can advance in. I certainly think that the element of personal satisfaction plays a vital role here," says Maj. Moshe, who was participating in the annual IDF's battalion commanders' course.

A generation ago, officers rarely spoke in terms of personal fulfillment in explaining why they chose a military career. On the Golan Heights last week, those taking part in the IDF course took turns "commanding" battalions of infantry-backed Merkava tanks, courtesy of the Seventh Armored Brigade, as they attacked and conquered mock Syrian positions.

It has been 23 years since the IDF fought on the Golan Heights and 14 since it even had to wage a serious battle, being forced to sit out the 1991 Gulf War. The army still trains for conventional war, but the past decade has been spent mainly doing glorified police work.

The diminished threat to Israel, combined with the belief that war seems a remote possiblity, has not only led to a drop in motivation to serve in reserves, but it may be one of the leading factors in the rise of a new kind of commander: a highly-trained professional who draws his incentive not only from patriotism but from an individual sense of success – a sort of military yuppie.

"We are still under threat and we can't forget that ideology is a strong motivator, but I see my military career as a profession. The army doesn't have to market itself," says 28-year-old Maj. Yariv. "Look, here I am about to assume command of an artillery battalion, and that is quite an achievement."

Nahal Corps Major Ron says his military path was mapped out deep into the next decade, but that the army allowed for a flexibility that let him take academic breaks. "We are not cut off from society. We reflect it," says the young, stocky major, adding that the IDF had recognized the trends of individualism in the Israel of the 1990s.

In any future war, battalion commanders are likely to find themselves being senior officers on the battlefield. It is crucial that they be able to function under pressure, and live-fire exercises train them in that. These exercises employ artillery, armor, infantry and air strikes, making them among the most expensive courses in the IDF.

According to the latest IDF figures, a battalion commander in the field nets about NIS 7,000 a month, not including a car and other benefits. "I can't say what motivated our chief of staff to decide to stay on in the army back in the 1960s, whether it was a sense of serving the homeland, or something else. But in today's era, personal reasons are very important," said another officer, who will shortly return to take command of a battalion of combat engineers.

The IDF recognizes this trend and is welcoming it. "This is the direction. Nothing can be done about it. The army sees itself as a profession and this demands this sort of attitude towards it and this kind of training. This is what we are heading for," said course commander Brig.-Gen. Zvika Gendelman.

Motivation among the 60 participants in the annual battalion commanders' course ran high. In fact, there were more candidates than places, instructors said. This year, the course was cut back from six weeks to a month, mainly to ease the burden on reservists, who make up two-thirds of the course, Gendelman said. But he added that the younger, regular-army officers in the course had a much more advanced grasp of military doctrine since nearly all of them had gone through at least a year of training at the general staff and command college.

While the peace process has brought about some changes in nuances, the IDF has not essentially altered its fundamental philosophy of defense. It is still an army based on its vast mobilized reserve force which must be able to throw a ring of steel and fire around three land fronts simultaneously, halt the enemy and take the battle to them.

While separated in age by a mere decade, there seemed to be a world of difference between the professional officers and the reservists. The latter shrugged off observations that they were a little off their rockers to have volunteered for the 30-day course while thousands are avoiding reserve duty.

"A youth who grew up when the security situation was difficult was imbued with elements he'll never shake off. But the youth who grew up in the era of peace has a much more difficult time," said Lt.-Col. Dr. Noam Haratz, 42.

Hosheah Ben-Shalom, a bearded, knitted kippa-clad, kibbutznik from Kibbutz Beit Yisrael, said he was led to the course out of a sense of mission.

"I have been fired at a lot in my life and I know what moves people under fire. The only way to deal with it is to put a tradition of dedication first. You can't do it out of a sense of professionalism because in a career you are not endangered; if you are a lawyer you won't die by losing a court case, you don't die by being a clerk in the Finance Ministry. You die in war and what motivates one there is totally different," Ben-Shalom said.

"It's hard to have an Israeli society with American values," he added.

Rugged reserve paratrooper Major Menachem Grayevsky is just a few generations out of a European ghetto. "If there wasn't such thing as reserve duty we would have to invent something like it," said the 36-year-old father of five. "In reserve duty we speak more of values. We are literally linked with the land. We are forging a bond with other men who will charge forward if need be. All this creates a different world."

A professional photographer in civilian life, Grayevsky spoke of the camaraderie among his generation of reservists. Ben-Shalom, 37, spoke of a longing for the Israel of his youth. They both seemed to use reserve duty as a way to hang on to that era.

Asked if they and their units would be able to stand the test of fire should war break out, the forum of reservists and professional officers answered in unison: "Without a doubt."

Katsav promotes tourism

Special to The CJN

Moshe Katsav, 51, Israel's new minister of tourism and deputy prime minister, was born in Iran and was first elected to the Knesset in 1977. He has held several ministerial portfolios under Likud governments and was appointed to his new post after this year's Israeli election. This is his first interview with a Canadian publication.

Q. Since Israel's creation, research has shown that less than 25 percent of North American Jews have visited Israel. What accounts for this situation?

A. The fact that less than 25 percent of North American Jews have visited Israel is alarming. From our perspective, treating this problem is the number 1 national priority. The first issue that I dealt with after assuming the tourism portfolio was announcing Jewish tourism as a main objective — both in marketing and in preparing infrastructure for this particular tourism segment. We are starting a survey analysing those in the North American Jewish market who have already visited Israel, in order to learn more about them. We are checking into a proposal for bar and bat mitzvah programs in cooperation with El Al. In addition, we are studying a proposal for special honeymoon, youth and student exchange programs in cooperation with North American Jewish organizations. There is no other attractive country like Israel that combines archeology, culture, health, tourism, sites, people, vacation possibilities and 360 days of sun during the year.

Moshe Katsav

Q. Could you provide us with some of your top priorities for the years to come?

A. Our number 1 priority is, as I said before, Jewish tourism and above all, Jerusalem. We are preparing all other sites in Israel, including the Dead Sea region and Eilat for the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel (in 1998) in order to make it a special celebration for all visitors to the country.

Q. How is the tourism industry preparing for both the 50th anniversary of the state and the new millennium? What is being planned for these special occasions?

A. At the present time, we are preparing for new tourists by adding hotel rooms. Events, exhibits and special concerts are also being planned to give visitors a unique experience.

Q. Until very recently, Israel was considered a "dead end" destination for travellers. What can Israel offer tourists who want to visit the entire region? What can you tell us about future regional tourism developments?

A. Since the peace agreement with Jordan, tourism packages at especially attractive prices, which combine Israel, Jordan and Egypt, are being sold in North America. The packages are varied and suit any type of tourist. You can cross between countries in a conventional way, but also by riding camels. We hope that in the near future, we will be able to combine visiting Israel with visiting other countries in the Middle East too.

Q. There appears to be a significant interest in tourists from the Far East. Can you give us more details about this new market?

A. Israeli tourism's success in the the Far East is mainly due to the fact that our relations with Asia are better. We have observed a large Christian pilgrimage movement with promising potential from Korea. The number of tourists coming from Japan is growing, and visitors are beginning to come from countries, such as Malaysia and Indonesia, which have never had relations with Israel.

Haredim mourn Satmar leader

By HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Thousands of Haredim participated last Wednesday in the funeral of Rabbi Moshe Arye Freund, 94, a Jerusalem leader of the Satmar Hassidim and head of the rabbinical court of the Eda Haredit.

The funeral cortege made its way on foot from the Satmar yeshivah in Jerusalem's Geula section to the Mount of Olives. Among the mourners were hassidim who had flown in specially from New York, including two sons of the Satmar rebbe.

Rabbi Freund, who was born in Hungary, was head of the Satmar Yeshivah in Jerusalem for many years. He participated in many protests initiated by the Eda Haredit, including those on Rehov Bar-Ilan a few weeks ago.

Rabbi Freund lost his first wife and eight children in the Holocaust. He remarried twice after coming to Israel and is survived by his third wife.

Shofar maker delights in beautiful result of work

By EMILY L. HAUSER
Special to The CJN

Deep in the heart of modern, cosmopolitan Tel Aviv, Yehuda Davida plies an ancient trade. Sanding, shaping and carving horns taken from rams, antelopes and goats, Davida creates wind instruments so steeped in history, it is said they were heard when God first gave the Jewish people the Torah.

The shofar holds a special position of importance in Jewish worship, and its moment of glory comes every year in the fall, when it is sounded in synagogues throughout the High Holy Days. Davida, like his father and grandfather before him, has been making the instrument all his life.

The shofar is sounded on each day of Rosh Hashanah, in keeping with the biblical commandment, "You shall observe it as a day of sounding the shofar." (Numbers 29:1) The only exception is when Rosh Hashanah falls on the Sabbath, as it does this year.

Three distinct sounds are made when the shofar is blown: the tekiah, a strong, solid blast; the shevarim, three broken notes; and the teruah, nine rapid-fire trills. No simple series of notes, these sounds are meant to do no less than express joy, inspire awe, warn of approaching doom and articulate spiritual pain.

"Awake oh sleepers from your sleep!" wrote Maimonides in describing the shofar's intended effect. "Rise oh slumberers from your slumber, examine your deeds, return in repentance and remember your Creator!"

The shofar has also been used throughout history to call armies to war and announce the crowning of kings. Tradition teaches that the coming of the Messiah will be proclaimed by the greatest shofar blast of history. And in a stunning example of modern technology serving ancient custom, those hooked up to the Internet can access the Judah L. Magnes Museum site at [www.jfed.org:80/shofar.htm], and hear the shofar from the privacy of their own PC.

The workshop in which Davida makes his shofarot is gamey with the odor of sheep and dusty with filings. "Some people make a face when they walk in here," he says dismissively. He loves his work and is concerned that the profession is dying out — Davida's is one of only three workshops in Israel.

The process begins when Davida receives a shipment of ram horns, from which the vast majority of the instruments are made. This animal was chosen in memory of the ram sacrificed by the Abraham in lieu of Isaac.

Surprisngly, the raw material's country of origin is important. "The horns from French sheep, and Moroccan, they're the best," Davida maintains, "but the ones from South Africa, they're hard, and dry inside. They can shatter like glass."

The first step is to clip off the horn's pointed tip and then remove the bone-like cartilage through its wide end. For many shofar makers, this involves boiling the horns for several hours, until the cartilage is soft enough to be pulled out. Not Davida. One solid whack of a hammer on the spiny ridge of the horn, and the cartilage comes loose.

Once the horn is empty, it is sanded until smooth, and then it is polished. Davida has machines with which he performs these tasks, which take him three to four hours. "Seventy years ago," he says, "the same process would have taken a week."

Now the shofar must be shaped and its narrow end carved into a mouthpiece. Both require that the horn be heated over an open flame, until it is pliant. Davida then slowly positions and repositions the shofar under a hydraulic press, straightening the naturally curly horn as he goes. Influenced by modernity, he drills a cone contour into his mouthpieces — he found this to be the most effective shape after observing it on trumpets.

The extent to which the horn's natural roughness disappears through a craftsman's sanding, polishing and shaping is, however, a function of the community for which it is being made. Moroccans want their shofarot to be thoroughly polished and perfectly straight except for one 90 degree curve up towards the heavens, so that the sound can "rise to God." Yemenites, on the other hand, generally leave their ram's horns as curly as they were on the sheep's head, and often allow most of the horn's original surface bumps to remain.

Nor is it guaranteed that each community will in fact be using a ram's horn. Yemenites often utilize the headgear of antelopes and gazelles; Turks make use of goats. All these animals were approved by rabbinical authorities many centuries ago.

"I've been doing this for 40 years," Davida says, "and it's my greatest satisfaction. You take real garbage and make something truly beautiful. It's the greatest thing in the world. Making something beautiful from gold is easy — gold is already shiny. But to take garbage like this and make something beautiful," he says, "well, that's just the best!"

A grand parade of pictures captures pride and joy of city

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Toby Asmoucha began training her camera lens on the Trinity-Bellwoods neighborhood where she was living in 1992, she realized that the frequent parades through the streets helped define the character of the largely Portuguese community clustered close to St. Mary's Church.

Turning to processions in other parts of Toronto, she saw how clearly they reflected the pride, politics, faith, memories, the joys and pains of the people.

Parade, a solo exhibition of black and white photographs at the Koffler Gallery in the Bathurst Jewish Centre until Sept. 27, is a telling mirror of what Asmoucha and her camera have discovered over the past four years.

Asmoucha uses black and white film here because she says, "For me, it's more descriptive. Color distracts you from the more subtle gesture, from thinking 'what a bright dress' instead of noticing what's really happening.

Children bundle up at the St. Patrick's Day parade.

"I like photographing communities and the parade is where they can show what they want to, of themselves. It's about revealing and defining your culture to yourselves and the rest of the community. And it's showing your kids what you do.

"I didn't photograph these as events but more as little moments within ..."

Certainly the marchers are significant. The enduring Remembrance Day veterans, the staunch Orangemen and women, the solemn religionists, the gorgeously cotumed Caribana participants, the Gay Pride advocates, demand attention. But, says Asmoucha, who has also photographed the spectators, each is important to the whole. The paraders may beat drums, carry banners, strut. The onlookers react.

Asmoucha describes herself as the outsider, just an observer, not setting anyone up, just wandering around.

"I'm almost invisible," she says, "just shooting whatever connects to me. I don't want to sneak up. When I can make people aware that I'm taking their picture, I do."

Not all parades are joyous, she says. Some commemorate sorrowful events, others are militant. However, Caribana, with its brightness and rhythms, is a feel good extravaganza.

Jewish people, she says, tend to have walks, rather than parades, though there is an annual Jewish War Veterans march.

Concurrently on view at the Koffler, but continuing until Oct. 27, is Montreal artist Freda Guttman's multimedia installation, Cassandra: An Opera in Four Acts. Linked to the myth of Cassandra and Apollo, it explores Guttman's response to the changing mores of her era and environment.

The artist will give a public talk complementing the exhibition at 8 p.m., Sept. 25 in the gallery. (Koffler Gallery at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, 4588 Bathurst St. Hours, Sunday through Friday, 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Admission free. To inquire further, call 636-1880).

Women Sculptors: Sensual, tactile, energetic and spontaneous are adjectives that might be used to describe the work of seven Jewish women sculptors collectively known as Stoneworks & Company.

The artists are Barbara Bender, Naomi Reich Freudmann, Lilli Gillman, Edie Harlang, Cindy Kirsh, Helen Kirzner and Sandra Duba-Shubs. Eight years ago, none of the women knew each other. At the time, they were involved with raising families, juggling careers and looking for ways to explore creative energies. Now they are preparing their third group show.

The Stoneworks & Co. group show explores the dynamics of stone carving. It runs Sept. 19 to Oct. 6 at 80 Spadina Ave., Suite 306, Toronto.

Last year, she established the Gila Almagor Wish Foundation, which provides the children with toys, computers, trips and other wished-for items. "When my time comes, what am I going to say?" she asks. "That I spent my whole life painting my face with stage makeup?"

Two recordings pay musical homage to the high holidays

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – In sharp contrast to the secular new year, the Jewish new year, Rosh Hashanah, is not a time of party-making, revelry or intoxification. The Days of Awe, as the 10-day period between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur is known, is a time of soul-searching introspection and sombre reflection as the Divine Creator judges each person and determines who shall be inscribed into the book of life.

In keeping with the sanctity and seriousness of these holy days, the Western Wind, an American vocal ensemble, has recorded two CDs that pay musical homage to the major prayers, rituals and songs of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. Along with the Western Wind, the recordings feature the richly operatic voices of cantors Alberto Mizrahi, Faith Steinsnyder Gurney, Jacob Ben Zion Mendelson and Charles Osborne.

Entitled The Birthday of The World: Music and Traditions of the High Holy Days, the CDs present a Rosh Hashanah service (Part 1) and a Yom Kippur service (Part 2). The music, conducted by Matthew Lazar, has been made no less beautiful than the prayers themselves, yet nowhere does it succumb to florid ornamentation.

The composers include Louis Lewandowski, Sholom Secunda, Yossele Rosenblatt and David Nowokowsky. Though they may be unfamiliar to many synagogue goers, these are some of the greatest names in Jewish liturgical music.

It is ironic and symptomatic of the TV age in which we live that the most well-known name on these recordings belongs to narrator Leonard Nimoy, the actor best known for his portrayal of Spock on the Star Trek TV series. Nimoy conveys a reverential tone as he recites passages from the Rosh Hashanah machzor (prayerbook) or explains the role of the cantor during prayer services.

"The cantor, the singer who leads the congregation in prayer, need be neither rabbi nor priest," Nimoy explains, "but someone with a melodious voice with perfect knowledge of all the prayers and benedictions. Known as the shaliach tsibur, the emissary of the congregation, the cantor carries our hopes and prayers to God on the wings of his voice."

Both recordings come with full liner notes providing a spiritual, historical and musical background.

Those who listen to Public Radio International may hear the Yom Kippur segment being broadcast sometime in mid-September. To order either or both recordings or to learn more about Western Wind's Judaica Series, call 1-800-788-2187.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

Gorgeous Elora: Frothy and energetic, the Grand River drops more than 30 metres as it seethes noisily down the Elora Gorge, a dramatic, water-carved limestone canyon that cuts through the pastoral landscape of southwestern Ontario.

Towering 33 metres above the gorge and the rushing current, the Elora Mill Inn is a reconditioned 150-year-old grist mill with 32 comfortable guest rooms.

A rustic haven, the inn is the historic centrepiece of Elora, a picturesque hamlet (population 3,300) whose main street is lined with colorful shops and well-preserved 19th-century storefronts.

Rooms of the Elora Mill Inn are decorated with pioneer-style wooden furniture, cosy armchairs and antique washing-machine stands that smartly double as luggage racks. The beds are covered with Amish-style quilts made by local Mennonites, and all rooms on the top floor have four-poster beds and high cathedral ceilings traversed by attractive wooden beams.

Although few guests ever realize it, the photograph by the front desk of 19th-century Indian chief Sitting Bull is a family heirloom of innkeeper Tim Taylor. His great-great-uncle was a colonel in the North West Mounted Police who was involved in the surrender of Sitting Bull.

The family donated Sitting Bull's peace pipe and his daughter's moccasins to the RCMP Museum in Regina.

More colorful history is reflected in a plaque on a guest room door, identifying the room as the Florence Nightingale Suite. The famed British nurse, who served so selflessly in the Crimean War during the Victorian era, was romantically linked with a pastor who came to Canada and served in a church in Elora, where the chalices she sent him are still on view.

The balcony of the inn's Penstock Lounge offers a superlative view of the gorge. Crowned by trees, those gigantic rounded bluffs seem almost close enough to touch.

Accessible to hikers, this bold natural panorama is part of the 300-acre Elora Gorge conservation area, and features caverns, rapids, falls, quiet pools and the stubborn Tooth of Time rising up from the swirling water.

Elora makes an an excellent excursion from Toronto, especially if you want to see some fall colors. To get there, take Highway 401 west from Toronto to Highway 6, drive north through Guelph for 5 kilometres, then take County Road 7 north to Elora. The Elora Mill Inn is located at 77 Mill Street West. 519-846-5356.

Israeli History in Stamps: An exhibition of postage stamps at the Spertus Museum in Chicago traces the history of Jerusalem for the past 150 years, from pre-state rule under the Ottoman Empire to World War I, the British mandate, World War II and the establishment of the state of Israel.

Postal Passages: Israeli History By Mail displays some 55 postmarked envelopes, postcards and wrappers. The exhibition continues through Nov. 14. 618 South Michigan Ave. 312-322-1747.

While in Chicago, you may wish to visit Degas Beyond Impressionism, the Art Institute of Chicago's special exhibition of powerful but little-known works of the impressionist artist Edgar Degas. The show runs Sept. 30 to Jan. 5, 1997. Several hotels are offering special packages in association with the exhibit, including the Best Western Grant Park, Claridge, Essex Inn, Raphael, Ritz-Carlton, Sutton Place, Swissotel and Talbott. Anne Frank in Vienna: A new exhibition, Anne Frank, A Story of Our Times, makes a world premiere at the Vienna Town Hall Oct. 3 to 30. One reason that the show's Amsterdam-based organizers chose Vienna is that Miep Gies was originally from Vienna. It was she who helped and supported the Frank family and the family hiding with them in Amsterdam, and who found and salvaged Anne's diary. Miep Gies is planning to attend the opening.

Jewish calendars are works of art

By ROSE KLEINER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jewish calendars have increasingly become a means of bringing rare Judaica treasures, and their history, to a wider public.

All the calendars mentioned below give candlelighting times for the major cities of the continent, Sabbath Torah readings and legal holidays in Canada and the United States.

This year's Jewish Calendar (for the wall), from Universe, has as its theme Art from the Jewish Museum (New York), in the Contemporary Spirit. The Jewish Museum is represented here by artists like Larry Rivers, Adolph Gottlieb, Robert Indiana and R.B. Kitaj. Spanning over 40 years, from postwar modern art to contemporary works, the calendar includes pop art, abstract art and Post-Minimalism.

The Universe Engagement Calendar has been beautifully redesigned and contains several important additions. It lists Haftorah readings for Sabbaths and holidays, and has a unique Jewish Holiday Reference Chart that in addition to dates and blessings gives such information as the holiday's major theme, its biblical and historical significance, its mood and selected customs. Both major and minor holidays, fast days and such other times as the Omer period, Rosh Chodesh and Israel Independence Day are included in this chart.

The illustrations cover objects from the Klutznick Jewish Museum, in Washington, D.C., and come with a fine introduction by the museum's curator, Ori Z. Soltes. We find in this calendar a stunning Papercut Mizrach (intended for the eastern wall of the home) from 1810 Russia. From 18th-century Germany, there is a miniature Bible, with a built-in magnifying glass, which most probably belonged to a travelling merchant.

The Jewish Calendar 1997, by Levin Associate, has illustrations of treasures from the Jewish Museum in Prague. This calendar lists Jewish holidays up to 2002, and includes four wallet-size calendars. Among its illustrations is a silver filigree etrog basket made in 1807 Vienna and a beautiful 19th-century silver filigree mandolin-shaped spice box from Bohemia.

The Jewish Engagement Calendar 1997, also from Levin Associates, has a list of Jewish holidays through the year 2011. Its rich color images focus on Judaic artifacts and masterpieces from the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, ranging from a magnificent 15th-century Italian Renaissance manuscript, the Sefer Emet, to an illustration by the Russian Constructivist painter, El Lissitzky, from the early 1920s. And there is an incredibly detailed gold-leaf illumination of the Five Scrolls, from Vienna, 1758. Hand-written in Hebrew, German, Latin and French by a master scribe, it is a fine example of the micrographer's hand in 18th-century Europe.

A selection of some of the best images of illuminated Hebrew manuscripts, in the British Library, grace the Jewish calendar, Illuminations (from Pomegranate publishers). The library's holdings of Hebrew manuscripts, and Hebraica, consist of several thousand volumes. Dating from 1280 to 1780, the illustrations in this calendar transport us through five centuries of Jewish spiritual and esthetic life.

For youngsters, Kar-Ben Books published an entertaining and instructive calendar. My Very Own Calendar has suggestions for recycling and speaks of such topics as Cyber-Talmud — a Talmud study program on the Internet that will link e-mail participants with a study partner on the Net.

Youngsters learn about the origins of the blessing with which children are blessed by parents on the Sabbath.

The calendar can be ordered toll-free by calling 1-800-4-KARBEN, both in Canada and the United States.

Israeli economy in trouble?

CJN wire services

JERUSALEM – Three ominous signs emerged last week hinting that Israel's economic growth is stagnating and possibly heading for a recession.

Recently the Finance Ministry reported that in August the Israeli government's domestic spending exceeded its domestic earnings by NIS2.089, or $4.7 billion.

Since January the government's local deficit has reached NIS8.6 billion ($19.5 billion), well above the $17 billion targeted for 1996.

Senior Bank of Israel sources said the government may be forced to raise taxes to counter this shortfall. In fact, Finance Minister Dan Meridor hinted at such when he said he saw as "undesirable" a deficit which was accumulated to finance an improvement in the general standard of living.

Also in August, there was a drastic shortfall in internal revenues. Senior treasury officials don't know what caused the shortfall, describing it as "totally unexpected."

State income tax revenue is currently NIS1.5 billion ($3.4 billion), short of the level forecast by the Treasury and the annual shortfall could reach $8 billion by the end of December.

Meanwhile rumors are circulating on the Tel Aviv stock market that Moody's, a stock and bond rating service, has warned of possibly lowering Israel's credit rating, now at A-3, because of Israel's budget deficit.

The Bank of Israel has denied reports that it received a letter from Moody's.

Humor course examines Jews in world cinema

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Toronto Jewish Festival and the York University Centre for Jewish Studies are putting Toronto on the Jewish cultural map, says York Univeristy film professor John Katz.

"Toronto is becoming known as a centre for Jewish film. The United States has a reputation for being in the forefront of Jewish Film. We're becoming leaders in this area too," Katz said.

One of a handful of North American academics who specializes in Jewish film, Katz teaches the only full-year university Jewish film course in North America. He will also be giving a six-week course on Jewish humor for the Jewish Film Festival at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

The university course, given jointly by the Film Department and the Centre for Jewish Studies, looks at the portrayal of Jews in world cinema by examining Jewish characters and the treatment of Jewish themes such as family and assimilation.

The Jazz Singer, made in 1927, 1952 and 1980, is always part of this course, because it is the "quintessential Jewish film," Katz said. "It was the first time large audiences saw Jewish life." The films deals with such themes as intergenerational conflict, Old World and New World values and assimilation.

Other Hollywood films screened in this course include Annie Hall, Gentleman's Agreement and Hester Street. There is also a selection of international films from Canada, Israel, Europe and South America, as well as Yiddish films made before World War II.

The Jewish humor course, which starts Oct. 2, includes films by Mel Brooks, Woody Allen and the Marx Brothers.

"You don't need to bring anything but your sense of humor," Katz said.

His interest in Jewish film began 15 years ago, when he was doing research on autobiographical film documentaries for a book. He noticed that 40 to 50 percent of the films were made by Jewish people, he said.

"I got interested in the whole idea of exploring Jewish identity through film," he said.

He began attending Jewish film festivals, the first of which took place in San Francisco 12 years ago.

Many more films with Jewish themes are being produced, he said. "There's been a renaissance in Jewish films. A lot of Jewish film-makers are recognizing their ethnicity."

To register for the university course, call 736-5149 and for the humor course, call 324-8600.

Woody Allen will be studied at the Jewish humor course

Jarvis coach retires after rewarding 33 years

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When school reconvened at Jarvis Collegiate recently, students may have noticed that one of the school's more prominent fixtures was missing.

Longtime phys ed coach Marv Pearl had packed his gym bag, stocked away his souvenir pennants and championship cups and had left the building for good.

After 33 years of coaching basketball, soccer, tennis, cross-country running, football and volleyball at the downtown Toronto high school, Pearl decided that it was time to hang 'em up at the relatively young age of 57. He's able to do so because all his children are self-sufficient professionals and he was entitled to retire with full pension benefits.

For Pearl, it's been a long and rewarding ride at Jarvis, one in which "neither Jarvis nor I have looked back."

He believes the student athletes he's coached will have found the experience rewarding as well. The core of the philosophy he tried to instill was that with hard work and dedication, anybody can compete and become great at any sport.

Marv Pearl

As much a psychologist as a teacher of technical skills — perhaps more so — Pearl saw his job as "building students' confidence in themselves. From that, all successes will result.

"If you're dedicated at what you do, you can become great at anything," he asserts.

Jarvis has been perceived as being one of the more successful schools at inter-school athletics, but "you can't win all the time," Pearl cautions.

There have been some disappointments but he believes "students will tell you the best lesson to learn was how to deal with defeat. You can see it as a stepping stone to success."

Furthermore, "if you overcome obstacles, the character and the outlook you develop in a game are easily transferred to real life."

His former modest and cluttered office behind Jarvis' famed gym is testimony to his success as a coach. The four walls are lined with trophies celebrating Jarvis championships in a variety of sports from 1971 through 1995.

Ironically, at an early point in his career, it didn't look like Pearl was ever going to get a coaching job at all.

A one-time student at Associated Hebrew Schools and later Vaughan Collegiate, Pearl graduated from university in 1963. At first he couldn't get a job even though jobs went begging. With his diminutive stature, he concedes "I don't look like a gym guy."

However in July, only a day after he was married, he got a call from the principal of Jarvis offering him a job. He began by teaching gym to grades nine through 13 while he also served as junior basketball coach and the assistant football coach, working with head man Tom Watt.

From there he went into cross-country running, soccer, tennis and volleyball. "Many skills are transferrable, if you have a basic understanding," Pearl said.

Pearl has never taught at any other school. He's enjoyed working with the young people at Jarvis too much.

The school attracts youth from Toronto's multiracial core area and helps integrate them into Canadian society through sports, which serves as a great "common denominator," Pearl said.

"You get the opportunity to work with kids from all over the world," he said. He's formed strong bonds with his former students and he was especially touched by a dinner in his honor five years ago organized by the school's alumni.

Though he's retired now, he hasn't severed his connections to sports entirely. He'll continue to run the annual Metro All-Star Classic, which he launched at Jarvis 25 years ago.

He'll serve as a consultant for the World Youth Netball Championships and he'll continue to run the 32-team CNE Peewee Baseball Tournament, also begun 25 years ago.

Pearl plans to do some scouting as well, beating the bushes for good young Jewish hoopsters in his capacity as chair of men's basketall for Maccabi Ontario.

Looking back on his career, Pearl would like to be remembered for his efforts at building character. "You don't get anywhere without putting in the effort," he says. "If you put in the effort, you'll be successful. If those who've passed my way can carry that with them, they'll be able to adapt anywhere."

Jewish sports scene has changed over time

By BILL ZIMMERMAN

SECHELT, B.C. — Last summer, I was at the local Legion hall sampling the steak special. I was alone, and so they sat me in a corner facing a huge sports channel TV tuned to wrestling. One of the contestants was Barry Horowitz. Yes, Barry Horowitz, a Jewish wrestler! There aren't many.

My thoughts travelled back to a time when Jewish wrestlers were far more common. It was the 1930s and early '40s, when wrestlers were referred to as "grapplers" or "grunt and groaners" or "mat men" (as opposed to boxers, who were "mitt men").

In those days, wrestling, while suspect, was considered a little more scientific, less of a spectacle, and heavyweight wrestlers weighed about 100 lb. less than their TV counterparts today. Jews were fairly prominent and they used their real names (Stein, Cohen) not titles like "The Undertaker" or "The Ultimate Warrior," like today's TV dramatists.

The changes in the Jewish sport scene since the '30s aren't restricted to wrestling. Back then, Jews contributed comedy and character to the games they played — a far cry from the humorless "bottom line" players' agents, owners (Modell) and league commissioners (Selig, Bettman) who seem to dominate Jewish participation in major league sport today.

In wrestling, there were Sammy Stein, Sammy "Fitzpatrick" Cohen, Benny Rosen, Abe Yourist (also a pro footballer with the Chicago Bears), Al Krusher, Jack Bloomfield, Raphael Simcha Silverstein, Dr. Fred Meyer and Dave Levin, the "Jamaica (Long Island) Butcher Boy" who won what was described as the "world's title" be defeating one Ali Baba in 1937.

Stein, who was portrayed by Ring Magazine (June 1938) as "America's foremost Jewish wrestler," played football with the New York Giants and for some strange reason was cast as Joe Choynski in the 1942 film Gentleman Jim, the Hollywood version of the life of James Corbett.

It was in baseball, not wrestling, where two of the greatest Jewish characters thrived: Al Schacht and Moe Berg.

Berg ("The Professor") is currently the better known of the two thanks to Nicholas Dawidoffs recent biography, The Catcher Was A Spy. Well-educated (BA Princeton, law degree Columbia), a secret service agent during World War II, Berg was one of the most mysterious eccentrics in the history of sport.

Schacht, on the other hand, became wealthy as the "Clown Prince of Baseball." Here's how he's described on one baseball card: He "got more mileage out of 14 games won as a pitcher than any 300 game winner ever did. His angular face, spidery build and talent for clowning made a millionaire out of him."

Moe Berg

With battered silk hat, black tailcoat dusty and scarred, his Washington Senators' grey travel pants and well-worn baseball shoes, Al joined Nick Altrock as the Senators' gate attraction, home and road, where they (both were Senators' coaches) would convulse ballpark audiences with their antics.

There are smart players, like Schacht and Berg, and there are dumb plays. When it comes to my opinion as to the dumbest play in Grey Cup history, we find two Jews involved. It was 1943, Winnipeg RCAF Bombers vs. Hamilton Wildcats. Before half-time Dave Greenberg, Winnipeg's quarterback, caught a Hamilton kick 20 yards behind his goal line. Instead of conceding a single point (Winnipeg was only trailing 12-7), Greenberg returned the kick to the 15 yard line where it was caught by Hamilton lineman Abe Zvonkin, who might have been the only Jew in the Eastern Conference that year. Zvonkin ran it to the 10 from where the Wildcats staged their longest touchdown march, to take the lead 18-7 and pretty well put the game out of reach. Zvonkin distinguished himself further by being tossed out of the game (a first in Grey Cup history?).

In hockey, "Badman" Larry Zeidel, a brawling defenceman for Detroit (briefly) and Chicago and Philadelphia, probably qualifies as a "character," maybe even a comedian. But the hockey list is short. Possibly this anecdote explains why: Vancouver orthodontist Sid Kirson was a pretty fair athlete in his youth in Winnipeg. I recall being at his house a short time after he injured his leg refereeing a university soccer game. The subject of hockey came up. Sid's mother announced firmly from the next room: "Dr. Bermack says hockey is not a game for Jewish boys."

What would a Jewish mother (any mother, these days) think of "my son, the prize-fighter?" It's a fair question because it's in the brutal sport of boxing that Jews have produced some of the most interesting originals.

One of those who qualified is Joe "Yussel" Jacobs, longtime fight manager, whose contribution to the English language was "I should have stood in bed." Jacobs included in his stable of fighters Max Schmeling, one-time heavyweight champion, occasional Nazi sympathizer (there's argument about this) and German paratrooper.

And then there were "Slapsie" Max Rosenbloom and Max Baer, light heavyweight and heavyweight champions, respectively, in 1934. According to the Encyclopedia of Boxing, Rosenbloom, who fought 299 bouts, learned the art of stepdancing from his pal, George Raft, and used it to great advantage in his fighting. Unfortunately, he did not always close his gloves, and for that they called him "Slapsie."

Rosenbloom held the title from 1930 to 1934, losing it to another Jew, Bob Olin. After retiring from the ring in 1939, he went to Hollywood and played "characters with a raspy Lower East Side accent. He performed credibly in a number of films, including Jimmy Cagney's Each Dawn I Die.

Max Baer, the "Merry Madcap," could have been called the clown prince of boxing. Blessed with a magnificent physique and great hitting power, Baer paid little attention to training. He won the heavyweight title from Primo Carnera, "putting the giant Italian down 11 times in 11 rounds ... clowning and joking throughout the contest" (Encyclopedia of Boxing.) Unfortunately for Baer, his clowning around didn't work when he tried to defend this title against Jimmy Braddock in 1936. He lost in one of the major upsets in boxing history.

Like Rosenbloom (but only half-Jewish), Baer went into films after leaving the ring, always in tough-guy parts. In Humphrey Bogart's The Harder They Fall, he played a fighter with a murderous punch, a role uncomfortably close to real life because Baer did indeed kill a man in the ring, Frankie Campbell, and severely injured another, Ernie Shcaaf, who died after a later fight (with Carnera).

Baer's younger giant brother, Buddy, fought Joe Louis for the heavyweight championship twice and was in a few films after his fight career. Max's son Max Baer Jr. was Jethro in the long running TV series The Beverly Hillbillies.

And finally, there was Ben "Evil Eye" Finkle. Ring Magazine (August 1943) profiled Mr. Finkle this way: "Let it be known that Finkle, in the good old days, used to rent out the services of his left optic to fighters who believed same was needed. A mere glance, a wink, a leer, generated to various intensities could create havoc in the other fellow's cerebellum and diminish his chances of winning considerably."

As a matter of fact "Evil Eye" became so important to fighters who hired him, that they had to provide him with a bodyguard before important fights and take out an insurance policy on his life.

Oh, Schacht, Berg, Rosenbloom, Finkle, Baer, Zvonkin . . . Where are you, now that we need you?

Is Grey Okay?

Grey hair is unique. There are many theories as to what causes our hair to turn grey - stress, heredity, and the aging process. The fact is that grey hair is hair that has lost all its natural pigmentation. Some hairs grow in grey and others fade from root to end.

There are people who look great with grey hair - and, as colourists, we believe in enhancing hair and can easily shine away unwanted yellow tones.

When only a few grey hairs start to appear, we notice them immediately. They are shiny as if they are shouting "Here I am". We are able to camouflage them with a technique called Reverse Shining. This is achieved without the use of colouring by shining your natural colour and dulling the grey (the same illusion appears when your hair is wet).

The decision to colour grey hair is only half the battle. Because there is no pigment in the hair, we can't just apply a tint. When painting a red wall white, the first coat turns to pale pink. The same theory applies to colouring grey hair. Natural hair has up to five different tones and several shades must show through to prevent the hair from looking like a wig.

The challenge of grey hair is an every day occurrence at The Cutting Crew. Show this ad during October and November 1996 and receive $10.00 off any colour, highlights or perm services.

Israeli doctor working at Mount Sinai

TORONTO — Dr. Sorina Grisaru's recent fellowship at Mount Sinai Hospital has strengthened the ties between Shaare Zedek Medical Centre and Toronto's medical community even more.

A staff gynecologist/obstetrician at Shaare Zedek since February 1989, Grisaru has been in Toronto furthering her expertise in maternal and fetal medicine for high risk patients.

Here, she has been able to treat a much wider variety of patients and in far greater numbers than would be possible in Jerusalem.

As a regional referral centre, Mount Sinai offers physicians an opportunity to treat people of many different backgrounds and diseases.

Dr. Sorina Grisaru (second from left) at a recent Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation reception. She is shown with (from left) Sheila Dropkin, foundation national executive director; Dr. Riccardo Granovsky; Renee Solursh, foundation past president; and Arthur Dropkin.

Working with high risk pregnancies

Attached to the ob/gyn department at Mount Sinai, Grisaru has been working with women whose pregnancies are considered high risk due to high blood pressure, diabetes or lupus, to name a few.

She has also been involved in fetal therapy — performing such intra-uterine procedures as transfusions and "shunting" of extra fluid in infants still in the womb.

As part of her fellowship experience, Grisaru has also worked at the Hospital for Sick Children and at Women's College Hospital.

In addition to her clinical work with patients, she has been involved in research on placentas to determine the cause of certain birth defects and anomolies.

On her return to Israel, Grisaru will be caring for healthy women as well as those at risk. She hopes to develop a team approach at Shaare Zedek so that several people will be able to rotate tasks within the department and take over from each other. She's especially excited about the opportunity to work in the planned Shaare Zedek Woman and Infant Centre, and has been encouraging her Toronto colleagues to visit Jerusalem to study all the innovations at the centre. She also hopes to do more research, perhaps in partnership with the medical school at Hebrew University.

Shaare Zedek is currently building the Woman and Infant Centre, to which the hospital's maternity, neonatology, gyncology and in-vitro fertilization departments will be moved.

"Approximately two-thirds of Jerusalem's population is Orthodox, to some degree," she continued. A secular Jew, she nevertheless feels that "the Orthodox characteristic of Shaare Zedek should be kept. The nursing is different there because of this. It's far more sensitive to the sanctity of life."

Grisaru believes in a consultative approach to patients and having faith in patients' common sense. She admits, however, that doctors should guide them in making choices.

Born in Romania, Grisaru immigrated to Israel with her family when she was 12 years old. She and her brother studied at the Hebrew University High School, in which her 13 year old son is now enrolled. Her brother is also an obstetrician/gynecologist.

Her six-year-old daughter Simma and her husband, Dr. Riccardo Granovsky, will be in Toronto with Grisaru until late December. Riccardo is an adult neurologist, with expertise in behavioral modification, particularly for patients with dementia and Alzheimer's. During the couple's stay in Toronto, he has been working at the Baycrest Centre. On their return to Israel, Dr. Granovsky will resume his post as a lecturer in Beersheva and also hopes to join the Shaare Zedek staff to help treat Jerusalem's increasingly aging population.

SOME TENDER LOVING CARE

Treating osteoporosis

Jerusalem Dateline

REHOVOT, Israel — One out of every three women over 50, more than 200 million people worldwide, suffers from osteoporosis. A little known bone disease 10 years ago, osteoporosis is now emerging as a major health priority. At high risk are women after menopause, whose bone mass is affected by a decrease in the estrogen hormone.

Treatment of advanced osteoporosis is difficult, costly and often ineffective. The best results come from prevention and early treatment of the disease with a calcium-rich diet, regular exercise and drugs. The need for "an early warning system" to measure the bone's health, as well as increased awareness of osteoporosis as a debilitating disease spurred the development of an accurate, safe, diagnostic tool using ultrasound technology.

A team of Israelis with expertise in medical physiology and ultrasound technology have designed a precise, novel system to detect the bone disease. Called SoundScan 2000, it not only measures bone density, but also the critical elasticity or stress that a bone can take.

Radiological techniques currently used measure only bone mineral density, and not elasticity. An important advantage of the Israeli system, developed and marketed by Myriad Ultrasound System, Ltd., is that it measures both the density and elasticity of the cortical bone (the compact bone which forms the structural shell) which makes up 80 percent of the human skeleton. The ultrasound system uses no ionizing radiation and thus requires no safeguards.

SoundScan 2000 has been on the market for a year. It is sold through distributors in Europe, Asia, South America, as well as in Israel.

The Inside Back

About families

Dear Susan,

I am recently separated with two young children ages four and seven. How do you suggest that we set up our High Holy Days this year?

Dear Reader,

I am sorry that you have recently undergone a marital separation. Although you and your children are moving through a grieving process, it is important that you endeavor to establish and maintain family rituals and traditions that will transcend your change in circumstances.

The children have to process the fact that the fabric of the family as they know it has changed. As they move through that process, the structure and dynamic of the family will develop new configurations. That is part of the adventure since you really have no way of knowing how your new family will structure itself.

Since this is the first holiday since the separation, doing whatever you can to maintain the status quo is critical. Your children, and to a large extent you, will judge the viability of the new family unit on how it manages to maintain an atmosphere of normalcy during this time. Ultimately, you and your husband have to put aside whatever bitterness exists and decide what is best for your children. Above all, you must not put your children in the position of choosing one parent over the other.

As the holidays approach, the fact of the separation will become more pronounced to your children, and they may begin to exhibit specific coping mechanisms. For example, the 4-year-old might regress and become clingy, while the 7-year-old might become stoic, for fear of hurting you. Again, the key is to develop and maintain a sense of normalcy and security. Reassure your children that the holidays will be a family time that will be spent in a way that meets the needs of all family members. If traditionally you went to your in-laws on the first night, maintain that pattern.

As they move through this period in their lives, you children will learn that traditions and rituals provide a zone of comfort and safety in a confusing, turbulent world. Above all, as parents demonstrate diplomacy and composure, the holidays will become an emotional safety net for all of you, from which you will all benefit.

מאת: יעל זליגר

כאן נגור, מאת: עמליה כהנא-כרמון, הוצאת הקיבוץ המאוחד/ספרי סימן קריאה, 1996.

הסופרת, עמליה כהנא-כרמון שייכת לדור שלחם במלחמת השחרור, אך מבחינה יצירתית היא נחשבת לדור הסופרים שלאחר הקמת המדינה. סיפורה הראשון התפרסם ב- 1956. גם כאשר עברה כהנא-כרמון לנורמות כתיבה חדשות, סירבה לנתק עצמה מדור הסופרים הקודם. מכאן שסגנונה העברי משייך אותה לסופרי שנות הששים כעוז ויהושע, אך לעתים סגנונה מזכיר את עידן ההשכלה. למשל: "ואנוכי", במקום "אני", "שפורפרת חזות" במקום טלסקופ, וכו'. פה ושם, ניסוחיה מאולצים אך כללית, העברית עשירה ומסוגנת היטב.

כאן נגור, אינו אלא קובץ סיפורים שהתפרסמו בעבר בארבעה ספרים. חשיבות הקובץ בכך שסופרת מקורית זו תיחשף שוב לקוראים. אני מוצאת בכתיבתה טוהר, עקשות ערכית ועוצמה. אין אצל כהנא-כרמון פשרות.

את הסיפור העצוב לב הקיץ, לב האור אני אוהבת כדגם מעולה ליצירתה של כהנא-כרמון.

מסופר על משפחה לא מאושרת, משפחה נעדרת אהבה. כל הדברים הנאמרים והמתרחשים במשפחה מצטמצמים למישור התכלתי: ארוחה, קפה, קריאת עיתון, שיעורי-בית, סיגריה. האם היא "אשה שאיננה מחייכת לעולם". כל בני המשפחה מתייחסים זה לזה כאל חפצים דוממים. את בני המשפחה סובבים פריטים מעותים כמו ספה שרובצת בפתח, ותמונת אשה שכל חלקי גופה מנותקים. גם שאר תושבי העיר תל-אביב מתוארים באווירה הנשלטת על-ידי אנונימיות והעדר אותנטיות. ובכ"ז, יש והאור חודר למצב המשפחתי ומתגלם בילד וחלומו על "לב הקיץ, לב האור", מפעלו העסקי של האב, אור חירת, ומראה עץ חלימון ועץ התות. ולפתע פריצת הברק: האם פונשת ברופא והכל חשים בבלבול היצרים, המעשים והמלים. לראשונה מכניסה האם עצמה לסיטואציות בלתי-מבוקרות. השינוי באם משפיע על האחרים. כהנא-כרמון מריצה אותנו מעולם תפל, ללא רוח, לעולם של דופק מהיר וספונטניות ושוב, כצפוי, לאחר הפריצה ביחסי האנוש, לכשלון הבלתי-נמנע.

"Inscribe all the children of your covenant for a good life."

Rosh Hashanah Machzor

L'Shanah Tovah Tikateivu V'techateimu
Tikatev Vetehatem Lehayyim Tovim Uleshalom

L' Shanah Tovah

Humanity is our strength

Unlike Cain's guilt-ridden denial when God pointedly probed his conscience, we are, have always been and will always be "our brother's keeper." It is the vow to God, binding on us, of our forebears at Sinai. It is our promise to our people. It is our responsibility to the rest of the world.

Editorial

But because we are, after all, only human beings, it is a vow not always remembered, or a promise not always honored, or a responsibility not always borne. We are overwhelmed occasionally by the "burdens" of modern life and, sinewed only with flesh and blood, we buckle. We set aside the right thing for the easy thing.

After a time, we tend to see our bowed back as weakness and the poignancy of our humanity as frailty. But to do so is wrong. For it is that very humanity which is at once our great strength and the deep glory of God's design for us, his creations.

This special supplement to the Rosh Hashanah issue of The CJN is dedicated to that humanity, imperfect, vulnerable, strained, but ever so inspiring.

Thus, we have asked seven esteemed rabbis of the extended Canadian community to write about Pirkei Avot, the traditional Jewish "guidebook," if ever there was one, for the prevention of moral buckling.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa provides an overview of the six "chapters" of Pirkei Avot. The distillate of his essay is a crystal that can stir moral indifference to social responsibility. It is also a powerful antidote to self-doubt.

"God created human beings with a propensity for good, but we are not programmed individuals; we are choosing individuals...Ethical sensitivity is something we must work towards, something we must continually emphasize, through a delicate and viable combination; study to know what we must do and implementation of what our studies have told us to do."

The reader will find a variety of features in the supplement. We have focussed however on a number of stories and photos about the "triumph" of the individual. Struggling with life's forces, the individual is its truest hero, when, as Rabbi Bulka writes, he achieves "the natural goodness that is within us all."

Throughout this supplement we have also featured photos of individuals from Israel. They are the faces of Aliyah, of Jews from around the world. Their absorption in Israel is funded by contributions to local UJA/CJA/UIA campaigns. The photos were provided by the United Israel Appeal.

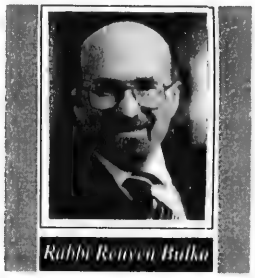
Eliciting the natural goodness that is in us



Rabbi Reuven Bulka

What would summer be without Pirkei Avot? What would Pirkei Avot be without the summer?

It is one of the unique geniuses of Jewish affirmation that Pirkei Avot has been a Shabbat summertime afternoon study staple for many generations.

Pirkei Avot

What exactly is Pirkei Avot? The literal translation of the words Pirkei Avot is Chapters of the Sages. The chapters contain a treasury of ethical insights designed to instruct us in our ethical obligations.

Generally, a Talmudic tractate contains a vast array of topics. Even though the title of a tractate may be specific, its contents are free-flowing and wax far afield.

Pirkei Avot is among the exceptions. It is a treatise which deals exclusively with ethical issues.

The fact that Pirkei Avot has become the summer study of choice is itself an ethical statement. Shabbat afternoon in summer is usually longer than in winter. More time is a blessing, if used correctly. However, extra time squandered, or used in an irresponsible fashion, can be quite destructive. Rabbinic tradition attributes the destructive behavior of the generation prior to the flood to the fact they had too much spare time and filled that time with behavior unfit for human beings.

Shabbat afternoon is a great blessing. For many, it is the opportunity to recharge the batteries depleted from a week's hard work, via some extra sleep. That is fine. But there are those who do not need that much sleep, and those who even after the sleep, still have extra time.

What better to do with the extra time than to hone our ethical responsibilities, to study a treatise which instructs in the way that we should be, to become better individuals? Pirkei Avot is more than equal to the task.

Parenthetically, it must be noted that there is absolutely nothing wrong with studying Pirkei Avot any day of the week, even in winter.

One of the interesting differentiations between the normal study of a Mishnaic text such as Pirkei Avot, and the way it is studied, even recited mantra-like in the summer, is that the summer study and/or recitation contains a preamble and postscript. The preamble and the postscript are themselves quite illuminating insofar as the intent of Pirkei Avot for us.

The preamble states that "All Israelites have a portion in the world to come, as it is said — 'And your people, all righteous, shall inherit the land forever, the branch of My plantings, the work of My hands, to glorify Me.' " (Isaiah, 60:21)

"All Israel have a portion in the world to come" is an odd preamble to an ethical treatise. Its message is quite powerful. We are told that we all have the capacity to actualize the good. We begin life, not from a negative starting point, but from a positive position. We begin life with an assumed righteousness, with a share in the real estate of eternal life.

The ethical way of behaving is not unnatural; it is the normal and natural way for human beings to behave. All that is asked of us is to be consistent with the spiritually oriented nature with which we have been endowed.

This statement is supported by a text which states that the people are "the branch of My planting." The human being's ethical development is as natural as the branches' development from the tree. A tree has many branches but only one trunk. Here is projected the picture of diverse individuals who are all unique in their capabilities, all branching out in their unique searches for meaning, but all connected to the source, to the trunk, to the Torah. Pirkei Avot is the trunk and all of us are branch extensions of that trunk.

Ultimately, the connection to the trunk and the branching out in ethical expression, serves "to glorify Me." God created human beings with a propensity for good, but we are not programmed individuals; we are choosing individuals. There is no glorification of God in puppets who react in almost cause-and-effect manner to God's string pulling. God's glory is achieved through the human choice to be Godly.

One who studies Chapters of the Sages begins the journey through Jewish ethics with a share in the world to come. The ethics spelled out in this lovely volume are not beyond human expression. They may seem difficult at times, even unreachable, but the instruction transmitted is geared towards eliciting from human beings the natural goodness that is within all of us.

So we begin Pirkei Avot with the very simple proposition that "you can do it, because you are a good person."

The postscript to Shabbat afternoon study of Pirkei Avot is likewise fascinating. It is the famous statement attributed to Rabbi Hananya the son of Akahshya, who states "The Holy One, Blessed is God, desired to make Israel worthy; therefore God gave them Torah and commandments in abundance, as it is written 'God was pleased for the sake of God's righteousness to magnify and glorify the Torah.' " (Isaiah, 42:21)

The postscript links the contents of Pirkei Avot with everyday life. Jewish ethics is meticulous in its detail. This is in addition to the great detail in the commandments. It is enough to overwhelm and to even scare off. However, there is a method to this, a purpose in our being overwhelmed. This is that "God desired to make Israel worthy; therefore God gave them Torah and commandments in abundance."

What is expected of us, as we begin life from a positive starting point, is to do our best to attain ethical excellence. This is achieved through continually striving, never being satisfied with what we are today, and always being resolute about becoming a better person tomorrow. In other words, there is no room in life for slothfulness.

Study can never cease, nor can we ever slacken off from the fulfilment of our obligations. These must permeate our life and fill our every available moment.

On the one hand, this is a tall order. On the other hand, we cannot afford to take chances with what Victor Frankel referred to as the existential vacuum. The existential vacuum is the void that people feel in their existence, if they lack a sense of meaning and direction, a sense of purpose to life itself. Lacking a sense of direction, having nothing to strive for, the human being becomes a breeding ground for all sorts of neuroses.

Pirkei Avot, in fact all of Judaic responsibility, in its all-encompassing scope, avoids this vacuum. There is never a moment when a Jew can say, "I have nothing to do." Try this treatise to study, this good deed to actualize, this project to contemplate.

With constant challenges before us, with study that beckons, with good deeds that literally plead to be fulfilled, we have no opportunity to slacken off, and every opportunity to become meritorious.

The fact that we were thrust with this massive responsibility was not intended by God to submerge us in a pile of obligations. It was intended to give us the tools to flex our spiritual muscles so that we become better people.

We know of atrophy that derives from the failure to exercise. Even a person who has been in bed for only a few days finds the first steps afterwards a little bit more difficult than anticipated. This is because the muscles which have not been utilized attenuate to some degree. Thankfully, it is usually possible to recoup muscle strength. But the message is clear. What we do not use we can very easily lose.

The same is true in the spiritual sphere. We do not suddenly turn on to ethical sensitivity. Ethical sensitivity is something we must work towards, something we must continually emphasize, through a delicate and viable combination; study to know what we must do and implementation of what our studies have told us to do.

Rabbi Israel Salanter, the great proponent of Musar (ethical instruction), when asked what a person should study if only a half hour is available, said — study Musar. A skeptic suggested that Rabbi Salanter was advocating this for self-serving reasons, in order to promote his "Musar School."

However, Rabbi Salanter, with his classical wisdom, justified his observation with the rationale that if you study a portion of the Talmud, that is obviously good. However, if you devote that half hour to ethical instruction, that ethical instruction will inspire you to find even more time for study and good deeds.

Chapters of the Sages is a treasure of ethical instruction. It is Musar par excellence. It is the ideal way to spend every available half hour, for one very simple reason. When you devote half an hour to study of Chapters of the Sages, it will open up so many other hours of good thoughts and good deeds that you contemplate and that you carry out, and that will make the world a better place and make you a better person.

What a wonderful way to spend Shabbat afternoon. What a wonderful way to live.

Setting the tone on how we should live as Jews

By Rabbi Y. Benarroch

As a congregational rabbi, I spend a lot of time on the curriculum of our adult education program. Over the years, the most enlightening and engaging classes were those dealing with Pirkei Avot. The reason for this is simple, the words of our rabbis were extremely insightful; but more importantly, in their words there is a message directed to every person.

In essence, Pirkei Avot sets the tone of how we should live as Jews. That question is a complicated one. Ask 10 Jews and you will probably get 11 different answers. There are those who will say it is observing the mitzvot, others will argue it is being a good person and still others will say it is staying in touch with Jewish culture — and the list goes on.

Pirkei Avot
Chapter 1

In Israel today, we are seeing the extreme of these positions, where both religious Jews and secular Jews have very little tolerance for each other. I believe Pirkei Avot addresses the question of the ideal Jew and sets the standard for us in the beginning of Chapter 1 (Mishnah 2):

"The world stands on three things: on Torah, Divine worship and acts of loving kindness."

A close analysis of this mishnah will reveal three aspects of Jewish life. The first is the study of Torah. The serious doctor must know his profession; so too the Jew. A story is told of a man who once travelled to Israel on a vacation. While there, he wanted to buy a present for his rabbi. After a long search, he finally found a beautiful mezuzah. When he returned home he presented it to the rabbi. The rabbi opened it and noticed that it was empty inside. He commented to his congregant, "This is truly a beautiful mezuzah case, but tell me was there anything inside?" The man responded, "Rabbi, there was a set of instructions inside written in Hebrew, but I reasoned you're the rabbi, you won't need them; so I threw them out."

The first statement in our mishnah deals with the study of Torah. Judaism comes with instructions. Without being constantly engaged in the study of the instructions, we cannot call ourselves "serious" Jews. The first chapter is full of statements that reinforce the importance of Torah study. The fourth mishnah states, "Let your home be a meeting place for the sages and drink with great thirst their words." The sixth mishnah states how important it is to provide oneself with a teacher. In the 13th mishnah, Hillel warns of the danger of not studying, and in the 15th mishnah, Shammai states, "Make the study of Torah permanent."

But the mishnah continues. The second factor is avodah. Whereas the study of Torah is in the intellectual realm, avodah is in the realm of expression. Judaism requires not only knowledge, but expression as well. There is little value in the person who knows all the laws of charity, yet does not give a penny. Judaism expects us to be not only knowledgeable Jews, but practising Jews as well.

This idea is also expressed several times in Pirkei Avot. At the end of our chapter, Shimon ben Gamliel writes, "It is not learning which is essential, but doing." Shammai echoes these words in mishnah 15, saying: "Say little but do much." This then is the second aspect of the ideal Jew — one who is not only learned but also involved.

A set of standards

The mishnah does not end here. There is yet a third factor. The first two statements in the mishnah deal primarily with religious commitment. They are concerned with the type of relationship we have with G-d. The final statement of the mishnah introduces an entirely new element, gemilut chasadim — acts of kindness. It deals with the way we treat each other.

Our rabbis understood that how we treat G-d is of little significance if we do not know how to treat each other. Far too many of us for example are meticulous about the laws of kashrut — we are very careful about what goes into our mouths — yet we are careless as to what comes out of our mouths. Our rabbis warned that we cannot call ourselves truly religious people if we mistreat each other.

There is a very interesting passage in the Talmud — Tractate Sanhedrin. When the Jewish people crossed the parting waters of the sea, they sang shirat hayam. This beautiful song has been incorporated into our daly prayers. In it we proclaim, "Zeh Eli Veanvehu" — "This is my G-d and I will glorify Him."

The rabbis in the Talmud discuss the meaning of the word anvehu. They ask how does one glorify G-d? Two opinions are offered. The first opinion explains that the way to glorify G-d is by buying a nice lulav on Sukkot, or buying beautiful tzitzit. In short, to perform the mitzvot in the most beautiful way possible.

The second opinion, offered by Aba Shaul, explains that just as G-d is compassionate, so too must we be compassionate; as He feeds the hungry and visits the sick, so too must we feed the hungry and visit the sick.

The two opinions offered are not arbitrary. A close analysis of the two opinions reveals two approaches. The first opinion speaks of religious commitment — lulav and tzitzit, of how we treat G-d. The second opinion speaks of social commitment, how we treat each other. The first speaks of the beauty of the mitzvot; the second speaks of how beautiful people can be. The two together tell us what G-d wants — beautiful people doing beautiful mitzvot.

That is the message of our mishnah. The ideal Jew must possess these qualities. There must be religious commitment in the study of Torah and its observance. There must be social commitment in the way of gemilut chasadim. This is the ideal that Judaism asks us to strive for. Let us hope and pray we do not fall short.

A Jewish heart is the most important quality

By Rabbi B. Schneider

Mishnah 13: He [Rabbi Jochanan Ben Zakkai] said to them: Go forth and observe which is the good way unto which a man should adhere. Rabbi Eliezer said: A good eye; Rabbi Joshua said: A good friend; Rabbi Jose said: A good neighbor; Rabbi Simeon said: One who looks [ahead to see] what [consequences] shall be brought forth [by his own actions]; Rabbi Eleazar said: A good heart.

Pirkei Avot
Chapter 2

He [Rabbi Jochanan] said to them: I prefer the words of Eleazar Ben Arach to yours, for within the comprehensive character of his words, are your words [included].

We often hear people say, "I have a Jewish heart." What, we ask, does this mean? Perhaps a Jewish heart is one that requires a bypass, a result of all the chicken soup we have eaten over a lifetime. Perhaps a Jewish heart is one that breaks a little bit each time it hears a sad story or reads of another tragedy inflicting our world.

Rabbi Jochanan in this perek declares that a Jewish heart is the most important quality that a person can possess; he then goes on to describe this attribute.

We hear many put down the concept of a Jewish heart and declare that this is not enough to make us Jewish. One must do more to show his or her Jewishness. And yet, Rabbi Jochanan ben Zakkai, one of the most important sages of any period, declares this to be one of the finest character traits a person can possess. If we read the Mishnah more carefully we see that Rabbi Jochanan says this because he understands that a Jewish heart includes all of the attributes that were uncovered by his outstanding students.

Each quality, as stated in the Mishnah above, requires sensitivity and commitment. Each one on its own is a laudable and commendable way to behave, but what ties them all together is the "good heart," the Jewish heart. It challenges one to have a special sensitivity towards one's own needs and towards others. The Torah does not require us only to love our fellow man. We must not merely do him no harm; we must do him good through our actions, deeds and words. The dictum to have a good heart requires us not only to take care of the physical needs of our friends and neighbors, but to ensure the well-being of their emotional side, as well.

The perek teaches us not what the Law commands, but what the Torah requires. There is a difference. The Torah incorporates within it modes of behavior which society can demand of us to follow. If we carry them out, we are to be rewarded.

The Torah can demand of us to choose good friends and to live in a good Jewish neighborhood. It can demand of us that we should not be jealous of our friends and neighbors if they possess more than we do. It can demand that we establish charitable institutions that will take care of all the needs of our society – schools, hospitals, loan societies.

But the Torah cannot decree how we feel towards ourselves and towards that society in which we live.

Often we ask why G-d, who performed so many miracles for the Jewish people when we left Egypt, could not execute another miracle so that we would all be good, sensitive and faithful people? G-d could make such a miracle, but if He did, then the very essence of Torah teaching, freedom of man's will, and the very reason for man's creation, to achieve good in the world, would be abrogated.

Rabbi Jochanan understood this; and so, although he definitely agreed with all his students, he added that Rabbi Eleazar's point was the most significant: to be sensitive to our feeling and emotions, and through them to do good to ourselves and to others.

I recently returned from Seattle, where I attended the World Conference on Bereavement and I realized how fortunate we are to have rituals and observances that force us to face the tragic moments of life's realities.

Many of the sessions were devoted to ways in which one could incorporate ritual and meaning into the difficult period the death of a loved one brings. In many cases, people and whole communities, even religious ones, have no one to turn to for guidance and assistance.

Our tradition allows and incorporates many rituals, from rending

Violating 11 sins can be a costly move

By Barry Levy

Chapter 3 of Avot contains a teaching attributed to Rabbi Eleazar of Modiin, a town made famous by the Hasmonean rebellion centuries earlier.

Avot 3:11, which must be examined with a similar passage from Sanhedrin, bars from the world to come those who violate holy things, desecrate holy times, publicly whiten someone's face (embarrass someone), violate the covenant of Abraham and reveal things about the Torah that are (or, which is) not according to Halachah.

The anonymous part of Sanhedrin 10:1 (in some texts 11:1) adds to these and includes claiming that resurrection is not mentioned in the Torah, that the Torah is not from Heaven, and being an Epicurus. Rabbi Akiva added reading "outside books" and whispering Exodus 15:26 over a wound. Abba Shaul added pronouncing the Tetragrammaton as it is spelled.

Pirkei Avot
Chapter 3

Why are these 11 sins so severe that each can cost any Jew his a priori claim on a share in the world to come? And why does even one (at least of the first five) erase all merits gained from Torah study and the performance of good deeds, the epitome of commitment and observance?

The answers depend on realizing that each sin carries a symbolic quality that transcends its particular significance and that, as a group, they portray the most important ideological battle in which the Pharisees and early rabbis were engaged and one of the most powerful weapons in their arsenal.

The "violation of holy things" refers to the desecration of sacrifices, the prime aspect of Temple worship.

"Desecrating holy times" means observing a different schedule of holy days. It keeps from the world to come those who violate the accepted holy days and indirectly those who observe others.

"Whitening [or, in some manuscripts, reddening] someone's face in public" is, in rabbinic ethics, a crime of immense proportions. Barring such people from the world to come both protected those admitted and encouraged the avoidance of such behavior.

"Violating the covenant of Abraham" means avoiding or reversing circumcision.

"Revealing things about the Torah that are (or, which is) not according to Halachah" is unclear. Some texts contain only the first part of the line and thus prohibit revealing the inner secrets of the Torah or being negative about it. The second part can reinforce this or prohibit interpreting the Torah against Halachah, for example, taking the stories in Genesis in ways that violate halachic norms, or interpreting biblical laws literally, if the rabbis had adopted a non-literal interpretation. Medieval interpreters often associated the phrase with radical, allegorical interpretation, also practised by Egyptian and Christian readers of the Torah of Mishnaic times.

"One who says resurrection is not from the Torah." Some manuscripts and citations record this passage as: "one who says there is no resurrection." Resurrection and its derivation from the Torah were Pharisaic beliefs rejected by the Sadducees.

Commitment to the Torah's originating in Heaven was the cornerstone of Jewish belief. Epicureanism was often taken as rejection of belief in Divine providence. An apikorus (as popularly pronounced) was a heretic, in all likelihood one who denied the biblical notion that God is active in history.

The phrase "outside books" is usually taken as those ancient works not accepted into the biblical canon, perhaps those whose primary goal was to compete with it. For example, Jubilees is a fascinating pre-Christian rewriting of Genesis and the beginning of Exodus, which begins by claiming to be the true version of the Torah. The Temple Scroll — a very lengthy and engaging text discovered among the Dead Sea Scrolls that summarizes, paraphrases, interprets and augments the Torah's legal portions — speaks in God's name (in the first person), thereby making a similar claim.

The use of biblical verses for magical purposes is well documented in both Jewish and non-Jewish texts. Some rabbinic sources add spitting to the prohibition, which suggests that use of the verse alone is not considered as serious, but our mishnah rejects that, too.

The four-letter name of God was once pronounced as written. All else aside, this is clear from the fact that the word appears in the ancient Moabite text known as the Mesha Inscription and from its combination with the Hebrew letter hay to form a five-letter oath chet-yod-heh-vav-heh in the Lachish Letters. This combination is possible only when the first syllable of the name is pronounced as written. Later rabbinic practice replaced this pronunciation with a form of the word adon, itself later replaced in some contexts by HaShem, "the name."

These 11 sins can be seen in rabbinic historical context. Aside from Entering the world to come

the third item, which is lacking from many early witnesses to Avot and is likely a late addition, these sins all reflect both known ideological conflicts between the ancient rabbis and sectarians with whom they competed for followers, and differences over the interpretation and application of the Torah.

Violating holy things and desecrating holy times are both directly related to the interpretation of Torah passages about sacrifices and holidays. Pharisaic rules about sacrifices often challenged the Sadducean priests, and many ancient Jews observed Shavuot later than the rabbis because they interpreted one phrase in the Torah differently. Conflicting calendars and holiday schedules are evident from many ancient texts preserved in the Apocrypha and in the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Violating the covenant of Abraham was the way of pagans and Christians, who rejected circumcision as mutilation, but the latter also affirmed that the requirement to circumcise was a metaphor, a claim based on their interpretation of specific biblical verses.

Revealing things in the Torah that are (or, which is) not according to Halachah, may reject the allegorical Torah interpretation practised in Egypt or by early Christians.

Denying resurrection is an unmistakable reference to the Sadducees; the claim that the Torah is not from Heaven, to non-Jewish philosophy-based heresy, as is the reference to Epicurus and the related anti-biblical teaching.

The ban on "outside books" is directed at non-biblical texts written to replace the Torah. This may seem impossible, but one must recognize that rewriting the Bible was an important and pervasive literary activity in Greco-Roman times and perhaps much less radical sounding than it might seem today.

Using the Torah for magical purposes was sometimes done by both Jews and non-Jews. The prohibition against pronouncing the Tetragrammaton as it is written challenged the many Jews and non-Jews, especially gnostics, whose amulets and magical paraphernalia, discovered by modern archeologists, bear witness to international commerce in magical use of this pronunciation of the divine name.

It is thus clear that these 10 are based on attitudes toward the Torah and its interpretation that can be associated with early Christians, Samaritans, Sadducees, gnostics, and other sectarians. These groups all based their religious teachings on Torah but differed from the rabbis on the proper interpretation and application of specific passages.

This mishnah demonstrates the rabbis' awareness of these interpretive positions and how they polemicized against both them and their adherents. Denying access to the world to come was a serious threat in ancient times, and the rabbis used it to attack those who differed from them in essential aspects of doctrine and interpretation and to keep their own followers on the right path. Even if you study and practise the Torah, they were saying, you will be barred from the world to come for accepting any of these sectarian beliefs or interpretation. Following proper, that is, rabbinic Torah interpretation was the only way to the world to come.

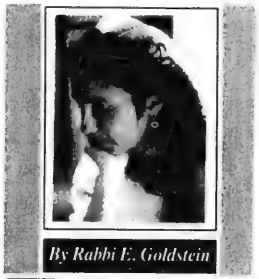
Timeless sayings relevant today



By Rabbi E. Goldstein

The fourth chapter of Pirkei Avot pulls together various sayings from the late second and early third century CE. The sayings are loosely related, but on a deeper level, they all seem to point in the same direction: everything matters and everyone matters. What an important lesson for us of the "quick and dirty" generation, for us of the "throw-away pack," for us who think that what we do and say is unimportant in the larger scheme.

Pirkei Avot
Chapter 4

It most clearly stated in 4:3: "Don't look down on anyone, or regard anything as unworthy. Every person has their moment, and every thing has its place." As we learn in Ecclesiastes, to every thing there is a season and a time for every purpose under heaven. You may not see it or know it now, but the point is to live as if you did. Pirkei Avot Chapter 4 teaches us that every step on earth makes a footprint in heaven.

In 4:1, Ben Zoma sets the stage with four seemingly simple questions: Who is wise? Who is strong? Who is rich? Who is honored? These are the four things everyone wants to be! The answers are typically paradoxical.

The wise one is not the one with two PhDs, lots of postgraduate titles and a long, unreadable thesis. The wise one is not the self-aggrandized teacher, rabbi or colleague up on a pedestal who disdains the unsophisticated questions. (We'll be warned later in 4:5 against using Torah-teaching to magnify yourself and your own opinions.) The truly wise one knows each person matters because each person has wisdom to share gained from their own perspective, their own life's experience. The wise one goes and studies more, with more different kinds of people, to gain even more wisdom.

The truly strong one is self-controlled, slow to anger; not macho, not out to prove their strength with physical force or aggressive prowess.

The truly rich one doesn't want to acquire more, bigger and better; this kind of rich, one stops and says, "Now that's enough."

And the truly honored one is the person big enough to share the glory and the spotlight. They know their goodness shines more brightly when it reflects the brightness of others around them. (In 4:8 we learn that even a judge — someone we'd assume is easily honored — must not serve alone and must not force others to accept his or her opinion as the only valid one.)

Timeless sayings relevant

The chapter ends on the same kind of motif. Like Ben Zoma, who begins by asking four simple questions, Rabbi Simeon ben Eleazer draws the chapter to a close in 4:18 by teaching us four simple ways to be a mentsh. They are so sensible that they are almost self-evident. But we need to hear them in all their plain pragmatism in order to say, "Oh yes, of course, that's right."

They are: Don't try and make amends with your friends while they are still enraged. Don't try and comfort someone while their beloved is lying dead in front of them. Don't question someone when they are passionately committed. And don't strive to be watching when they fall and are humiliated. In other words, as some of our parents advised us, "Don't be such a chochum!"

How often do we feel like fools — and realize we have worsened the situation — because we didn't wait, we didn't let the other person take the initiative, we didn't tune in to what they needed instead of what we wanted to give? And never is this truer than in the four circumstances Rabbi ben Eleazer enumerates: anger, grief, passion and shame.

If our spouse, our kids, our best friend blows up, we want to talk about it now! Fix it now! Express our opinion, our way of seeing it! When we pay a shivah call, we want to say something, anything! We want to take away the pain, invalidate the sorrow, pierce the silence! We get into arguments with people more dedicated to causes than we are, because we want them to change their minds! Join our team! Deflate their balloon! And, saddest of all, we seem to love to see people get hurt. Did you hear about so-and-so? Got a divorce. Lost a job. Kids in trouble. We want to see them when they go down. It seems to make us feel better about ourselves when someone else fails.

Rabbi ben Eleazer's four settings are tests of true character. Ben Zoma's four questions are questions of the true character. They are tests we will face if we are to take the New Year seriously.

It is now that we have a chance to rethink old definitions, old stereotypes, old expectations. Pirkei Avot Chapter 4 is teaching us that what we would have thought of before as wise may not necessarily be so. So rethink strength. Rethink wealth. Rethink honor.

Pirkei Avot Chapter 4 is teaching us that what we would have thought of as "proper" reactions to everyday crises are old conditioned habits. So rethink how you deal with anger. Rethink how you deal with grief. Rethink how you deal with zeal. Rethink how you deal with failing.

May we all have a wonderful season of rethinking, renewal and return.

Embrace your Jewish heart

our garments to eating a simple meal after returning from the cemetery, often prepared by friends and neighbors, which help us adjust to our loss and return to a new level of normalcy. We take these rituals for granted. When one goes to a house of mourning, one can be told what to do and what not to do; the etiquette is prescribed. But Rabbi Jochanan would say that if you possess and strive to possess a good Jewish heart, then not only will you fulfil your basic obligation of visiting the mourners, but you will go with a new awareness and sensitivity to the healing role that you may play and thereby contribute to the mourners' well being.

This demands a lot of us. It demands self-awareness. It demands a willingness to commit and to take a chance. It demands a vulnerability to hurt, yet a desire to help and to be part of another person's search for well being.

It is difficult to define a mentsh, yet somehow we know when we meet such a person. In the same way, with significant connection to our early sources and literature, we have the maxim, a good heart, a Jewish heart. Perhaps we still cannot define it, even with the help of Rabbi Jochanan and his students. Yet we know when one possesses it and most important of all when we possess it.

Have a good heart. Have a Jewish heart. Embrace it and not only will you possess physical well being, but you will have spirituality, essence and the strength of our heritage.

Provide yourself with a teacher; acquire a friend

By Rabbi E. Bolton

Pirkei Avot
Chapter 5

Pirkei Avot was the first rabbinic text I learned from, not counting the siddur. I say "learned from" rather than learned, for what we were taught, those of us at the Talmud Torah in Chomedey, was the p'shat, the plain meaning of the text. Perhaps we were considered too young to probe the ikkar, the essence behind the words.

It wasn't until many years later that I was reminded that I had learned from the book before, but had yet to learn it. It was the closing day of my first year of rabbinical school. The custom was for each of the graduating seniors to speak, briefly and informally, to the assembled students and faculty. It was an impressive class of six men and four women, already "teachers in Israel" as our diplomas proclaim.

Several of them quoted Pirkei Avot in their messages to us. It was very compelling, yet also confusing. Yes, I knew they had just completed their rabbinic studies, but they were offering those age-old texts as personal messages for us today. Weren't we just supposed to learn about them, to be capable of translating and teaching them? I understood that for some students, maybe those who retained a more rigorous approach to religious practice and Halachah, these words could hold meaning. But for me?

What about the radical, outspoken and outstanding woman who was one of my role models for a feminist and activist rabbinate? There she was, quoting Pirkei Avot, wholeheartedly insisting that the most important thing for us to learn in rabbinical school was this lesson from Avot 1: asse lecha rav ukenei lecha chaver — provide yourself with a teacher and acquire for yourself a friend.

Here was my mentor, urging us to invest in each other as teachers and as chevruta-study partners, and attributing her learning to the ancient Rabban Gamliel!

She followed this teaching with an anecdote about her first year, when yet another argument with a more text-oriented classmate ended with him shouting that clearly no book written before the 20th century had ever influenced her!

At first, I demurred. No — I resisted the lesson behind the lesson. I remained inspired and challenged, yet still unsure if I could ever allow such writings to guide or influence me. For seven years, I worked diligently, studying classical Hebrew and Aramaic, Tanach, Talmud, rabbinic thought and history, many practical skills.

But that's not what really took seven years. That could easily take a lifetime — the greatest rabbinic scholars probably begin, as Avot 5.21 suggests, with Bible at age five, Mishnah at age 10 and Talmud at 15. I had already reconciled myself with the knowledge that I was never going to fully "catch up," having begun my studies in earnest in my 30s.

What took seven years was the crumbling of my resistance and the acceptance of the ikkar of Torah learning that may be best expressed in Avot 5.22.

First, some p'shat. This chapter of Mishnah begins with a series of lessons very similar in format and tone to those found in Wisdom literature. They are characterized by the use of a numbers formula, such as the opening phrase: "By 10 phrases was the world created." Mishnayot two through six also enumerate things by 10s; the 10 generations form Adam to Noah, Avraham Avinu's 10 trials, and so on.

My favorite of these is Avot 5.6, the 10 things created on erev Shabbat bein hashmashot, the eve of the Sabbath at twilight. All twilights are mysterious and potentially dangerous — just think how difficult it is to drive a car or see a ball in the half-light of dusk. Then imagine the twilight of the first Shabbat — in slips Balaam's talking donkey [Numbers 22], the rainbow sign [Genesis 9], Moshe's magic rod [Exodus 7] and seven other wondrous creations!

We then proceed to messages by seven and by four, certainly significant Jewish numbers. This counting format is not unique to Mishnah Avot; it appears in other sacred texts, notably in Mishlei, the Book of Proverbs and several sections of the prophet Amos.

There are still several mishnayot intervening before the return to Pirkei Avot's habitual formula, namely, "so-and-so used to say." Avot 5.16 offers this striking, contemporary lesson: "All love that is based merely on something physical will not last, but if it is not based merely on the physical, it will endure forever. Which was based merely on something physical? The love of Amnon and Tamar [II Samuel 13]. Which was not based merely on something physical? The love of David and Jonathan [II Samuel 1]."

This passage, and the following one defining a controversy that is "for the sake of heaven" versus

One who studies Torah is a partner with G-d

By Yaacov Benamou

In Pirkei Avot, Chapter 6, Mishnah 1, we learn that one who studies Torah Lishma, i.e., for its own sake (to know and understand its contents and to apply his knowledge to enhance his understanding and solve new problems, and to study out of pure love of G-d with no ulterior motive except the love of G-d), merits many things. The mishnah then lists a number of spiritual successes which are a natural result of the refining quality of Torah study, but in addition to those, Rabbi Meir promises that there will be many worldly benefits, as well, such as a long life, health, wealth and honor.

Such a person is called "friend, beloved," and the creation of the entire world is worthwhile for his sake alone, since its purpose is realized through him. HaChassud Yaavetz explains that one who studies Torah with pure motives helps G-d in sustaining the world, and is therefore His partner (re'ah). The friendship between such a person and G-d is based on true love, and therefore will survive difficulties and disappointments.

Pirkei Avot
Chapter 6

This person loves the Omnipresent. According to the Kabbalah, G-d created the world because His goodness decreed that man and woman have the opportunity to confer good upon beings other than Himself, and consequently, one who studies Torah in the ideal way affords G-d with the means of carrying out His wish to bring blessing into the world. In this sense, he shows true love for G-d.

One who studies Torah for its own sake loves all G-d's creatures without cynicism or malice of any kind, simply because they are G-d's creatures. One who loves G-d truly, will not feel jealousy or any begrudges against anyone.

He gladdens the Omnipresent, he gladdens His creatures. By bringing others closer to Torah, either actively or by serving as a role model, one gladdens G-d. Furthermore, by introducing people to the Torah, he gladdens them and earns their gratitude.

One who studies Torah for its own sake is humbled by its vastness and depth. The midrash portrays the effect of Torah on those who study it: just as large grapes on the vine hang lower than the smaller grapes, so the more one grows in Torah, the more insignificant he appears in his own eyes.

It makes him fit to be righteous, devout, fair and faithful. The study of Torah for its own sake prepares one emotionally to attain elevated spiritual levels. He can aspire to be righteous in mitzvot between man and G-d, to be scrupulously devout in mitzvot between man and his fellow man, and to fairness in his own personal deportment and ethical development. All of these spiritual attainments will be consistent and enduring. According to the Chidushei HaRim, not only spiritually great people can achieve Torah study for its own sake. Anyone who is not yet righteous, devout, fair and faithful can reach these spiritual plateaus by studying Torah for its own sake.

The study of Torah moves the person away from sin and draws him closer to merit. The Torah protects not only from physical danger but also from spiritual harm. The Torah can provide man with the sanity to resist temptation and it motivates him to seek opportunities and situations that will enable him to lead a life of merit.

From a learned man people enjoy counsel and wisdom, understanding and strength, in mundane matters as well as Torah wisdom. He gives them understanding to delve into the depths of Torah and teaches them its practical detail, so that they will have the strength to overcome the impediments that stand in the ways of living a Torah life. Emunat Shmuel renders these four qualities as follows: counsel- to avoid sinning, wisdom- on how to fulfill our obligations to G-d, understanding- to penetrate the deep meaning of every mitzvah, and strength- to overcome our spiritual foes.

Torah gives him kingship and dominion

The Torah gives him kingship and dominion. To kings and scholars the Torah gives the guidance in law and behavior to exercise moral power, as well as analytical judgment. A scholar is able to analyze information and arrive at proper and conclusive judgment. The Torah scholar also merits the ability to understand the most mysterious details of the Torah.

He becomes like a fountain that produces sweet refreshing water, and at the same time like a river that flows in torrents. According to Midrash Shmuel, just like a spring that constantly grows stronger and can overcome anything that seeks to stop its flow, so the true Talmud Chacham does not allow any evil influence to halt his spiritual progress.

A person who attains an elevated spiritual level can easily become arrogant, but Rabbi Meir teaches us that when one studies Torah for its own sake, he enhances qualities that are accompanied by modesty. A truly righteous person will perform his good deeds quietly and without fanfare. Furthermore, he will be patient with people (Tiferet Yisrael).

One who studies Torah for its own sake is among those to whom the Talmud applies the passuk, "And those who love Him are like the sun coming out in its full intensity" (Judges 5:31). This refers to those who are insulted yet do not insult others, who hear themselves degraded yet do not reply in the same manner.

The elevated existence of an authentic Talmid Chacham raises him above all the changes of life. He views everything that G-d does from a higher perspective and sees clearly that all G-d does is for the good, and everything He does is elevated to a holier level.

In summarizing the mishnah, I would like to suggest dividing it into three catagories:

The first catagory describes how the study of Torah can benefit a person on a personal level. The study of the Torah elevates a person to higher spiritual levels and therefore he can aspire to do better in all areas of life.

The study of the Torah draws a person closer to G-d and he makes G-d proud of him.

The Torah changes a person to become kinder and more patient with others, as well as a source of learning and growing for his fellow men. Torah is the life-blood of the nation and Torah scholars are its heart. The more spiritual blood they pump into the rest of the nation, the better the nation's spiritual health.

Rabbi Benamou is the spiritual leader of Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun Synagogue in Winnipeg, Manitoba.

An important lesson

one that is not, both contain powerful and complex messages that merit deep, protracted study. The texts and scenes referred to must be probed, preferably in the original; the context or Sitz im Leben of the prooftexts, as well as the Mishnah, must be understood before a reading that is more than superficially useful can emerge.

But it is the message that follows soon after, in the name of Ben Bag-Bag, that is the essential one for me: "Turn it and turn it again, for everything is in it; re-examine it, grow old and gray over it, stick with it, for there is nothing finer than it."

The commentators all seem to agree that the "it" referred to is Torah.

Appending the chapter's final phrase complements the message beautifully: "Ben Hey-Hey used to say: According to the effort comes the reward."

The contemporaneous text Avot d'Rabbi Natan attributes these passages to Hillel. These two were said to have been proselytes and disciples of Hillel. It brings to mind the talmudic story [Shabbat 31a] of the scornful fellow who challenged Hillel to take him on as a proselyte, on condition that he teach him all of Torah while standing on one foot. Hillel replied, "What is hateful to you, do not do to others. This is the entire Torah, all the rest is commentary ..."

But this is just one story. After all, Hillel also said you must keep turning it and turning it. After all, his final words to his challenger were, "Go and study it." Amen, selah.

Fostering leaders in our community

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — David Barkin is a fine example of an up-and-coming Jewish community leader. The 34-year-old business executive is:

- a winner of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto's (UJA Federation) leadership development award,
- a regional council member of Canadian Jewish Congress,
- a committee member at Jewish Family & Child Service,
- co-chair of leadership development at the federation,
- and an active fundraiser for United Jewish Appeal (UJA).

With over 300 Jewish organizations serving a local Jewish population of 164,000, the community needs many David Barkins — leaders with a "vision" of where their organization or the greater community ought to be heading and the ability to motivate people to work with them toward that vision.

David Barkin

Good leaders need to be role models, says Gerry Fisher, UJA Federation's director of human resources and head of its leadership development program.

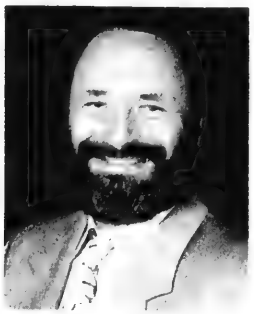
But idealism must be tempered with practicality. There's no getting around the fact that organizations and communities need money to continue providing services and to meet future needs.

The question of personal philanthropy — one aspect of role modelling — remains somewhat controversial.

Sandy Brown, UJA Federation president, faces the issue squarely. "I think that in many respects, the old communal leadership primarily came out of those who were able to be philanthropic. While I think that that is a very important component of leadership — being able to establish yourself as a supporter of the cause — it's not as much a focus as it used to be.

"I think it's important that everyone have an opportunity ... We have to have a broad spectrum of leadership, among them stakeholders who have the ability [to lead]. Our philanthropic families are best able to support [the community] and therefore they should be part of the decision-making process. Those who are our greatest supporters should be nurtured to continue. We should make sure leadership of the community is reflective of all its elements."

Sandy Brown



Gerry Fisher

A one-time Jewish community professional who requested anonymity was skittish about being quoted on the philanthropy issue. "There's still that perception that if you can't give the lead gift, you can't be a leader, but I wouldn't touch that with a 10-foot pole."

Fisher disagrees, but qualifies his comment, emphasizing the "expectation" within UJA Federation that leaders will contribute to the annual UJA/Federation campaign according to their means.

Have increased demands on personal finances taken a toll on Jewish leadership?

Surprisingly, given a virtually ubiquitous financial crunch, increasingly busy lifestyles and the amount of handwringing over Jewish continuity, Toronto appears to have no shortage of men and women in their 20s and 30s interested in taking an active volunteer role in the community, according to Fisher.

The UJA Federation leadership development program accommodates 40 to 50 participants in each 15-month session, and unlike its counterparts in communities of like size, actually turns away applicants.

'Important that everyone have opportunity'

But Brown, 55, would like to see more involvement among younger adults. "I would not put up a warning flag. There will always be a core of leaders. I would just like to see a lot more of the younger generation at the table. The numbers are not large when you look at the number of people out there. I think we have to create a community that's attractive to be part of and to serve."

In the last decade or so, young leadership groups have sprung up in many — perhaps most — established Jewish organizations here, as aging leaders increasingly recognize the need to pass the torch.

For participants, such groups can offer a social outlet as well as an opportunity to contribute to the community in a meaningful way.

"The bottom line is we have to have a good time [at fundraising programs]," said Hannah Douglas, chair of International New Leadership of Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in an interview last year.

At Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, the New Leadership group was established in 1985. Some of its older members have since made the transition to the "senior" Friends group.

Indeed, there has been an effort in recent years to integrate younger people into the established leadership structures of many organizations.

Barkin entered the world of Jewish leadership when he was invited to sit on the board of the Jewish Camp Council a mere two years after his last year as a head staff member at Camp Northland. Such a move was previously "unheard of," he recalls.

But the impetus for Barkin's involvement began well before he joined the council. When he was a counsellor at Northland, he began to realize "how special the camp was" as he became aware of those campers who received subsidies from the Jewish community enabling them to attend.

"As a camper, you don't understand that it's a community camp. I really wanted to continue doing some kind of service."

Allan Reitzes

כְּשֵׁם שֶׁאֲנִי מוֹחֵל לְכָל אָדָם כֵּן תִּתֵּן אֶת חֲנִי בְּעֵינֵי כָּל אָדָם׃

It was easy back then. But now it can be so hard.

Doesn't it seem that the more you need to say "I'm sorry," the less likely you are to say it? And the more you need to hear "I'm sorry," the less likely you are to accept it?

Look, we're human. We're going to wrong one another sometimes. But then we have a choice: live with it, deny it, or make it right. And you know you can't right a wrong by telling a friend or a counselor — or even God — how bad you feel about it. That doesn't do it. Neither does saying, "If I've hurt you in any way..."

The only way to make things right is to face the person you've wronged and say it directly: I wronged you in this specific way, and I ask your forgiveness for it. And then commit to yourself never to repeat the offense.

And when you've been wronged and the other person comes and sincerely asks for forgiveness, you have a choice, too. Sometimes it's very hard to forgive. But how long can you keep an injury alive before it cripples your life and degrades your character? Nurture it long enough, repeatedly refuse to reconcile, and the refusal becomes your failure.

In fact, there are times when the real act of courage is for the injured one to open the subject — to go privately to the wrongdoer and say, "You have wronged me." God knows it would be easier to go on carrying that silent grudge. But to initiate the conversation can open the way to reconciliation.

And to be reconciled? It's as though you wake up one day and for the first time in a long time, you're not encased in ice.

This is not a new self-help theory. For thousands of years this has been the real work of the days leading up to Yom Kippur. Torah teaches that before we ask God to grant us well-being and peace, God asks us to make peace with another human being. You know which one. Try.

To all our friends, and to the world which needs healing, we wish a year of reconciliation and peace.

Jewish education necessary for the future

The leadership development program opened his eyes to the structure of the Jewish community here, where Federation, funded by UJA dollars, serves as the umbrella for a wide range of community services.

According to UJA Federation bylaws, every Jewish resident in the Greater Toronto Area is considered a member. On an organizational level, "every [Toronto Jewish] school, every agency, every organization, every landsmanshaft, every synagogue — almost without exception" belongs to the federation, said Allan Reitzes, UJA Federation executive director.

Barkin became a committed supporter of the federation system, taking on a role in UJA as well as serving in affiliated agencies.

"[I was involved] on the spending side, and I felt I should be contributing to raising the money. I believe you've got to be involved in all aspects to be a well-rounded volunteer."

Fostering leadership to ensure a thriving Jewish community in the future has become a significant issue in the face of increasing assimilation and multiple demands on people's time, energy and dollars.

Brown believes that Jewish education as well as education about the community structure are necessary to foster future leaders.

For Murray Koffler, the prime prerequisite for leadership is "being stimulated by a concept." A well-known philanthropist in both the Jewish and general community, Koffler has taken on significant leadership roles as founder of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science in 1965 and as chair of the 1973 UJA campaign. He recently stepped down as world chair of the Weizmann society.

An Israel trip in 1956 was the impetus for his initial involvement as a leader in the Jewish community. His experience is not unique: many participants in UJA Federation's leadership development program report that "their lives were turned around" by a trip to Israel, says Fisher.

Koffler and his wife Marvelle, who has also taken an active leadership role, have worked to instil a sense of responsibility in their five grown children, but whether the next generation contributes within the Jewish community or outside it is "up to their choice," Koffler says.

Koffler's daughter Tiana Koffler Boyman, 33, and her husband Mark Boyman helped found a young leadership group for Weizmann "friends" in Los Angeles, where they lived from 1992 to 1995, and they recently co-chaired a Cirque du Soleil fundraiser for Toronto's Weizmann Society with another couple.

But Koffler Boyman says that while her father set a good example, it was her own personal interest rather than family obligation that spurred her involvement.

Brown traces her own involvement over the past 30 years to the example her parents, Celia and the late Joseph Tanzman, set when she was growing up in St. John, N.B., taking an active role in both its small Jewish community and the larger general community.

In a community the size of Toronto's, however, people tend to be "relatively anonymous as opposed to [feeling] needed," says Brown. "We need more leaders."

"You never have enough," agrees Reitzes. He admits that the community is facing a challenge, but remains optimistic. "There's no shortage of people with ability, and we have a community that is Jewishly educated."

He urges people to participate actively in the Jewish community. "All too often we equate leadership with being chairman or serving on a board. To my mind, being a leader is caring enough to do something, taking responsibility for being part of this community. If you're the one who has the ability to go beyond that and lead others, it will happen."

For Reitzes, it's important that everyone "show their bit of leadership. It's really about taking personal responsibility."

What a year!

By SHIRA HERZOG

The past year has proved just how futile our efforts to foresee and predict the future sometimes are. Ten short months ago Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated by a young Israeli who sought to kill the peace process by killing his country's leader. Six months later, the national election brought into power a new prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, who had been dismissed and ridiculed as incapable of ever making it to the top slot. Neither event was foreseen, and yet both had far-reaching implications for the future of the state.

Commentary

Elsewhere in the region, there have been surprises too. A year ago, an important realignment in the region occurred as Turkey signed a defence treaty with Israel. In that honeymoon period, plans were made for joint training exercises for Turkish and Israeli pilots. Now, with a change of government in Turkey and the ascendancy of the Welfare party, there is a concern that it may join forces with the regimes that Israel considers its enemies — Iran and Iraq.

In Jordan, where King Hussein has managed to hold the reins of power and to contain dissent within his population, sudden riots over price increases of a staple, bread, threatened the stability of the Hashemite regime, in spite of statements to the contrary.

And in the United States, the results of the November presidential election are becoming more difficult to predict, as the gap between the two candidates see-saws up and down.

In Israel's brief history, several of the most important and momentous events occurred unexpectedly, but they changed the tide of the country's future. The great aliyah, or immigration, of the '50s saw the arrival of close to one million immigrants from the countries of the Middle East and North Africa. Their presence in Israel profoundly altered its face and culture. The political and social implications of that immigration are still felt today, over 40 years later, in the social, economic and political arenas.

The 1967 Six Day War was the unexpected result of Egyptian president Gamel Abdul Nasser's decision to expel the UN observers on his border with Israel. The surprise lightning Israel victory and its territorial results have shaped the political divide in Israel for the last 30 years. A generation has now matured for whom the current status quo has always been there.

And in the last decade, the unexpected massive wave of immigration from the former Soviet Union brought to Israel some 700,000 new citizens, who have found their voice and who have transformed the country's political map, as witnessed in the last election. These are just a few examples of how the unexpected has dramatically changed existing patterns of thought and practice.

There may be an obvious message here for analysts who gaze with assurance into their crystal balls. But there may be an additional, more subtle message: History has shown that no one point of view has a monopoly on the truth. Any given side in the Israeli debate may argue its case with passion and conviction, but history has taught us that neither side can be sure that its sometimes apocalyptic predictions will prove correct.

Israelis' more critical attitude towards their politicians in the aftermath of the elections provides evidence of some skepticism towards the absolutist rhetoric that emanates from political quarters. If for decades, Israelis saw their political leaders as larger than life and charged with a Herculean mission, they now see them as mere mortals charged with a functional responsibility, who will be judged by their capability to deliver a better life for their constituency. The ideological fervor seems to be cooling. And perhaps that is a good thing. In the absolutist passion of ideology, a leader is either a savior or an archenemy. The results of such an approach, as we know, can be tragic.

After all, the debate in Israel is not over a choice between peace or security. Everyone, on the so-called right and left, is committed to peace with security. Rather, the debate is over the territorial component in the equation.

The left argues that it is not, and indeed, some on the left would argue that the territorial component, which necessitates ongoing occupation of large numbers of civilians, has weakened Israel and has made it more difficult to guarantee its security. The right argues that in the end result, in spite of the costs associated with continued occupation, the territories are an essential component of the security equation for Israel. Therefore, its proposals for resolving the conflict fall short of a territorial compromise.

From a Jewish perspective, it has been clearly established that both interpretations are valid. Therefore, the debate should be held on the national merits of the respective positions and with the best judgment available, as these critical decisions are faced by the country's leaders and people. The perspective and wisdom of history should give pause for reflection and perhaps lead to a cooling of the passions and emotions that have become such an integral part of the internal conflicts in Israel and the Diaspora. As we pray for a year of peace and fulfilment, let us remember that the unpredictable winds of history can sweep away our own certainty and feeble efforts at prophecy.

A brief history of our calendar

By REMY LANDAU

Most Jewish homes have at least one copy of the Hebrew calendar. These calendars will most likely have come from kosher food suppliers, Jewish product merchants, Jewish schools or Jewish fundraising organizations.

The calendars will be consulted for the dates and times of the Jewish holidays, candlelighting times, yahrzeits, weekly scriptural readings and other important social and religious functions.

Yet in spite of the enormous influence exerted by the Hebrew calendar over Jewish social and religious life, very little is known about it by most of us.

Our religious leadership understood that maintaining a calendar is so important through the command given to Moses in Exodus 12:2, just before the plague against the first born.

In the days of the Temple, a calendar council relying upon sod ha'ibbur, the knowledge employed in establishing leap years, was formed to determine not only the times for the new moons, but also which years were to be 13 months long. This council acted like a court and declared the arrival of the new moons on the basis of the observations of two reliable witnesses.

That ceremony was no mere formality even though biblical text indicates that our ancient scholars had the ability to predict the onset of new moons without prior observation. For example, both the prophets Isaiah and Amos predict the oncoming of solar eclipses (Isaiah 13:10-11, Amos 8:9). And Jonathan tells David of the future arrival of a new moon in I Samuel 20:18.

Despite advanced astronomical knowledge, Halachah required the declaration of the new moon by the beit din, based upon the testimony of the witnesses. The beit din, however had the authority and the right to ignore the testimony and to establish Rosh Chodesh on the next day.

In spite of such knowledge, the religious authorities at first vigorously opposed any attempts at publishing and distributing copies of the calendar on the grounds that such actions challenged their authority and could split apart the Jewish people. The Talmud records negative reactions to the publication of a one-year calendar by R. Chanina and later to a 60-year calendar by Reb Shmuel in the second century CE.

By the middle of the fourth century CE, Hillel II replaced the method of proclaiming new moons by observation with a set of fixed calendar rules to permit the calculation and publication of the Hebrew calendar throughout the Diaspora. These rules appear to have been finalized sometime in the 10th century.

The last great battle over the current calendar rules appears to have taken place at about 920 CE between R. Aaron ben Meir of Jerusalem and Saadia Gaon of Babylon. It almost resulted in a split of the 11th century Jewish community.

The technical argument was over Rabbi ben Meir's attempt to add 35 minutes and 40 seconds to one of the calendar's rules. However, the unfortunate circumstances of 11th century Jewish history eventually put an end to this split of opinion.

Since that time, the rules for the calculation of our calendar have remained unchanged.

Calendar cycle coming to an end

By RENY LANDAU

Completing the Hebrew Calendar's 19-Year Cycle

When Rosh Hashanah 5757 begins on Sept. 14, it will inaugurate the very last year of the current 19-year Hebrew calendar cycle.

So it would be quite appropriate to illustrate major features of the 19-year calendar cycle with this quiz.

But first, here are some facts.

Whenever the value of the Hebrew year can be evenly divided by 19, that year represents the last year in the 19-year cycle of the Hebrew calendar. For example, 5757 is exactly 303 multiples of 19.

The 19-year Hebrew calendar cycle was constructed by our ancient scholars so as to help synchronize the lunar months with the solar years, thereby keeping the calendar in pace with the seasons.

Almost 2,500 years ago, astronomers had determined the average duration of a lunar month to a precision of about one day in 14,000 years. They also discovered that 235 lunar months came very close to synchronizing the lunar years with the solar years. And so, they devised a cycle of 19 years consisting of 12 years of 12 lunar months and seven leap years of 13 months each.

The scholars also included calculation rules which caused any Hebrew year to be either 353, 354, 355 days long for ordinary years and 383, 384 and 385 days long for the leap years.

Since the average lunar month is a little over 29½ days long, the calendar was set up so as to have each of its months alternate regularly between 30 and 29 days, thus making "regular" years 354 days long (about 24.3 percent of all Hebrew years).

In regular years, Tishrei (September/October) is 30 days long, Cheshvan (October/November) is 29 days, Kislev (November/December) is 30 days, Tevet (December/January) is 29 days, and so on.

For 353-day years, one day was removed from the month of Kislev (about 10 percent of the years) and for 355-day years, one day was added to the month of Cheshvan (about 28.8 percent of all years).

The needed leap years were created by the addition of a 30-day long month of Adar (February/March) preceding the regular 29-day month of Adar in each of the seven leap years of the 19-year cycle.

Now, how many of the following questions can you answer?

Questions

1. Are all Hebrew calendar cycles of 19 years the same length?

2. How are the leap years distributed in the present 19-year Hebrew calendar cycle?

3. Does the Hebrew calendar repeat itself after every 19-year cycle?

4. Does the 19-year cycle ensure that Pesach can only come in spring?

5. Is Sept. 6 the earliest possible Gregorian date for the first day of Rosh Hashanah in our times because no earlier day can be found in the 20th century?

6. What is the latest possible Gregorian date for the first day of Rosh Hashanah in our times?

7. The rabbis ruled that Rosh Hashanah could only begin on a Saturday, Monday, Tuesday or Thursday. On which of those days does Rosh Hashanah begin most frequently?

8. Pesach can only begin on a Sunday, Tuesday, Thursday or Saturday. On which of those days does Pesach occur most frequently?

9. We love to wish each other biz a huntret und zvanzig. But, are all periods of 120 Hebrew years the same length?

Answers

1. No. The 19-year cycles can be either 6939, 6940, 6941 or 6942 days long. In addition to these lengths, other periods of 19 Hebrew years can also be 6938 days long.

2. The third, sixth, eighth, 11th, 14th, 17th and 19th years of the 19-year cycle are the leap years.

3. No. The Hebrew calendar repeats itself every 689,472 Hebrew years. At one time, it was believed that the calendar repeated itself in every 13 cycles of 19 years, that is, every 247 years.

4. No. The 19-year cycle makes the average Hebrew year slower than the average tropical solar year by about one day in every 216 years. That means that Pesach is gradually drifting into summer. Today, we celebrate Pesach about five days later than did our ancestors at the time of Saadia Gaon.

5. No. It is Sept. 5. This last occurred in 1899 and will next occur in 2013. After Rosh Hashanah 5080 (2089 CE), the earliest Gregorian date will become Sept. 6.

6. Oct. 5. This last took place in 1967 and won't occur again until 2043.

7. Thursday. 31.9 percent begin on Thursday, 28.6 percent on Saturday, 28.0 percent on Monday and 11.5 percent on Tuesday.

8. Tuesday. 31.9 percent begin on Tuesday, 28.6 percent on Thursday, 28.0 percent on Saturday and 11.5 percent on Sunday.

9. No. Periods of 120 Hebrew years can be either 43822, 43823, 43824, 43825, 43851, 43852, 43853, 43854 or 43855 days lomg.

As we begin a New Year, and so as not to deny anyone a single precious day of life, please let me wish you all the longest possible 120 years!

Chandelier inscription mystery revealed

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Some months ago, we published the baffling story of a remarkable pentagonal chandelier with a Hebrew inscription on all five sides. It had been discovered by chance in the lounge of a social club in a southwestern Ontario villages.

The words translated into English proclaimed: "This is the donation of Nachum Katz in memory of his son Avraham David, alav hashalom."

Who was Avraham David? How did he die? Where did the chandelier originally hang and why was it in this unexpected setting?

At first, there were no answers but through coincidence and persistent sleuthing, a chilling tale of murder has emerged.

Several weeks after the story appeared, when CJN staffer Leila Speisman was covering a meeting, she was approached by 81-year-old Mary Teich, who told her that Nachum and Fanny Katz had been friends of her parents.

Katz, she said, brought his family including David (Avraham David) to Canada from Russia shortly after the turn of the century and settled in Picton, Ont.

Teich provided more information which led ultimately to the discovery of a living descendent, David's niece (and Nachum's granddaughter), Lillian, of Katz's Delicatessen in Toronto.

Using this source, as well as out of town Jewish community leaders and Royal Canadian Mounted Police files containing old press clippings (there are five volumes in the RCMP files and a mounted police officer has described this as the most bizarre case he has ever encountered), we can conclude that, essentially, this is what happened:

Though Nachum Katz was shomer Shabbos, he prospered in local business and the fur trade. He was also very active in the synagogue he helped found in Belleville, not far from Picton.

At 20, David, went into business on his own, travelling by car across the Prairies with a hired assistant, a young Jewish man we will identify only as B (to protect any family members still alive).

According to Lillian, who knows of her uncle only through older relatives, the two men took orders from storekeepers for men's clothing to be shipped from Montreal. Newspaper items of the time, refer to David variously as a clothing salesman or a bond salesman. Perhaps he was both.

David was aware that B had been in trouble with the law. David himself had at one time accused him of theft and prosecuted B, who served a jail term as a result.

When B was released, David, knowing that he came from a struggling family, gave him a second chance and the two resumed their travels.

David drove a large car and wore good jewelry, notably a fine ring and a diamond stickpin. He also carried valuable papers and substantial amounts of cash.

One June day in 1928, as they were driving along a lonely stretch of road somewhere between Swift Current and Medicine Hat, B apparently told David they had a flat tire. When David walked to the rear of the car to check, B slipped up behind, hit him with a shovel, buried him in the sand dunes and continued on to Vancouver.

This is not the same story B later told police, but it is what the investigation uncovered.

Some time after the murder, Nachum Katz, worried because he'd had no word from David who regularly kept in touch, received a peculiar telegram from Vancouver. Ostensibly sent by David but probably from B, who knew well that Katz, a kohen, was a proud and committed Jew, it stated that David would not be returning home and could never see his parents again because he had become involved with a gentile girl.

Katz, immediately suspicious, set out for Vancouver.

Here, excerpted from a Canadian Press story dated Vancouver, Feb. 11, 1929, is what followed.

"Fate in the shape of a street car which failed to stop for a passenger helped a father finish his long chase after the man he believed could clear up the mystery of his son's disappearance.

"The father was Nathan Kates, Picton, Ont., whose son David was murdered on June 9 last and buried in the sand dunes in Saskatchewan, according to a story told to police by B, the man whom the father sought.

Hebrew inscription found on lost chandelier

"According to B, Kates was murdered somwhere between Swift Current and Medicine Hat and buried there. B said a third man committed the murder but that he helped bury the body. He is being held by police here pending word from authorities in Saskatchewan.

"Fate and the street car played their part when the elder Kates came here in search of B, The father was proceeding to the police station and waited at a downtown corner for the car. The first car did not stop and to this circumstance Kates owes the locating of B, for as he waited for another car, B came walking along the street. With a companion [possibly another son, Aaron, who was Lillian's father], Kates followed the wanted man until a police sergeant was encountered. Kates excitedly demanded the arrest of B.

"According to B's story to police, David Kates with another man and himself drove between Medicine Hat and Swift Current on June 9 and after they had travelled some distance, the second man remarked that a tire was flat. B said he got out to look and heard an altercation between his two companions. When he got back in the car Kates was semi-conscious. They drove to some sand dunes where Kates was allegedly struck over the head with a shovel after being partially buried in the sand. B, police state, said that the money, jewelry and papers of the dead man were removed from the body."

Jewelry

But in fact, Lillian affirms, when her grandfather found B, he was in possession of David's jewelry.

Though B steadfastly denied committing the murder, blaming it on a "Jimmy Brown" and claiming to be a passive bystander, he led police to a gravesite at an out-of-the-way spot near Gull Lake, Sask. David's father, who had accompanied the search party, collapsed.

After the remains were identified as David's, B was charged with murder. "Jimmy Brown" could not be found.

Two trials were held, both at Maple Creek, Sask. The first was adjourned after three days, following submission of a signed statement taken from B three months earlier is Vancouver. A Vancouver police sergeant admitted that during the questioning, he might have said something like, "You tell the truth or we will put a rope around your neck and stretch you longer than you are."

A Canadian Press wire from Maple Creek observes, "The jury was discharged because the statement, admittedly received after threats of violence had been made, had already been read in court. A. H. Friedgut, counsel for B, had urged that all statements made by B at any time following the threat be barred as evidence."

A new trial was ordered.

At the second trial in November 1929, some 35 witnesses from New York to Vancouver, were brought forward.

Fred D. Kuntz, a farmer at whose home B and Katz had stayed in the winter of 1927, gave evidence that he heard B say he would get Katz for having him jailed if it took 10 years. B's sudden affluence was noted (he had the car and was spending freely after Katz' disappearance). It was also brought to light that two men known to B had forged cheques belonging to Katz and cashed them through his bank accounts.

B was found guilty after a unanimous jury debated four hours and on Nov. 15, sentence was passed. He would hang on Feb. 19 in Regina. But a strange twist led to a reprieve.

A young woman from the west, described as B's sweetheart and named appropriately, Miss Love, read a newspaper dispatch in a local paper about a murder charge brought against one Emmett Sloan in Sydney, N.S., whose alias was Brown.

She said she instantly recognized Sloan's description as tallying almost exactly with the one she had heard B give of "Jimmy Brown," the man B claimed killed Katz. The young woman said her attention was attracted to the story by the name of Brown, which Sloan had given prior to his arrest.

B's execution date was postponed to March 11, 1930, while police investigated. However, when it was verified that Sloan was not in the west at the time of Katz' murder and after B was unable to identify a photo of Sloan shown to him by police along with several others, the execution was carried out and B was hanged on March 11.

The chandelier which Nachum Katz had commissioned in memory of his son, graced the shul in Belleville for many years until the congregation found a new home. It was then placed for safekeeping in the attic of some elderly relatives because Nachum was no longer alive.

The chandelier seems to have disappeared when the relatives died and could have been bought by an antique dealer who subsequently sold it to a lamp dealer who resold it to the present owner of the social club, hundreds of miles from Belleville.

Lillian, who declares that chills ran up her spine when she heard that the chandelier had finally been located, is hoping to bring it back into the family.

Syrian immigrants, Yaakov and Hasiba Ezra, with two of their three daughters. [Vera Etzion photo]

Syrian family makes it to Israel

By SIMON GRIVER
WZPS

Yaakov Ezra always dreamed of immigrating to Israel. But until 1994, his aspirations were not realized because President Hafez al-Assad of Syria kept the Jews of his country captive, using them as diplomatic pawns in the Middle East peace process.

Ezra came to Israel with his wife Hasiba, 26, and their two daughters Zhenny, 5, and Flora, 4. Their third daughter, Or, was born exactly one year later. The majority of the nearly 4,000 Jews who left Syria after 1992.

But about 1,500 Syrian Jews were brought to Israel by the Jewish Agency's Department of Immigration and Absorption, because like the Ezras, they insisted on making aliyah.

"We are traditional Jews and Zionists and have a lot of family here," says Ezra. "What would we have done in America? I have an uncle in America who says he is immigrating to Israel. He says America is a wonderful country, but it is not the Jewish state. All those years in Syria," he insists, "we prayed facing Jerusalem, not New York.

While most of Syria's Jews emigrated from Damascus and the large provincial cities of Aleppo and Homs, the Ezras came from the relatively small town of Kamishili in northeastern Syria, near the border with Iraq. They traveled to Israel via Turkey.

Ezra and his parents, Avraham and Jacqueline, who reached Israel several months after him, had a small grocery store and thriving spice trading business in Syria. "We left behind a large house and a car and a lot of money," he says. "But it was worth it to be here in Israel."

Despite the economic hardships, Ezra has no regrets about making aliyah. He has found temporary work with the Ministry of Education, preparing exams in Arabic for grade 4 to 8 schoolchildren, and hopes to join the police force in the coming months. They have bought a three bedroom apartment in the Jerusalem neighborhood of Gilo and will move there in early 1997.

"We decided to remain in the Jerusalem region," explains Ezra, "because we are traditional Jews. Tel Aviv is very beautiful and we love the seafront but it is too secular for us."

Despite her religiousness, Hasiba herself is less enthusiastic about life in Israel than her husband. "I am stuck at home looking after the children," she says, "as I was stuck at home in Syria. I also haven't been as quick to pick up Hebrew as Yaakov. But for me the most important thing is that the children are happier here."

Both Zhana and Flora attend the local kindergarten in the absorption centre. Flora can barely remember Syria but Zhana has vivid recollections and leaves no doubt where her preferences lie. "We went to the kindergarten in Syria," she recalls, "but not very much happened there. Here we are always having birthday parties and making special things for festivals."

While Zhana and Flora spare little thought for Syria, their father and mother often get homesick. "When I first reached Israel," says Ezra, "I would buy telephone cards and call my friends in Syria. We were a very small Jewish community so most of my closest friends were Christians and Muslims."

There is something remarkably Israeli about the Ezras even though they have been in the country for less than two years. Perhaps it is because they were born and grew up in the Middle East. Perhaps it is because they were traditional Jews who unlike Russian speaking newcomers, knew biblical Hebrew and Torah and celebrated the Jewish festivals even before they came to Israel.

"We felt at home here from the first day," says Ezra. "And most importantly, we feel secure."

Messele the first Ethiopian elected to Knesset

By GAIL LICHTMAN
WZPS

The recent dramatic election of Israel's prime minister may have captured the lion's share of headlines, but other equally dramatic events took place in the parallel elections to the 14th Knesset. Among them was the election of 35-year-old Addisu Messele, the first Member of Knesset (MK) from Israel's Ethiopian Jewish community.

"Being the first Ethiopian MK is a source of personal pride," Messele says. "It is also a source of pride for Israeli society and for the Jewish communities in the Diaspora, especially those in the United States and Canada which contributed so much to the aliyah of Ethiopian Jewry in both Operations Moses and Solomon."

Elected on the Labor party ticket, Messele, a staunch supporter of the peace process, sees himself as more than just a one-issue MK.

"Although I am sensitive to the issue of absorption in general and to the problems of the Ethiopian community in particular, I am an MK just like any other MK, not just one for sectoral issues. I received votes from the general Israeli population as well as from the Ethiopian community and I intend to contribute to policy issues, the peace process, social and economic issues and other issues central to the State of Israel."

Born in Gondar in northern Ethiopia in 1961, Messele immigrated to Israel in 1980, after escaping to Sudan, and took an active role in helping others from the Ethiopian community. He completed a bachelor's degree in social work at Bar Ilan University and during Operation Moses worked for the Jewish Agency helping Ethiopian immigrants settle in Israel. During Operation Solomon, he was sent to Ethiopia to help organize the amazing 36-hour airlift of 14,000 Ethiopian Jews.

In the early '80s, Messele founded the grassroots organization Beta Israel and in 1990, when the various Ethiopian community organizations united to create the umbrella organization, the United Ethiopian Jewish Organization, he became its president, a position he still holds. Since 1987, Messele has been working at the executive committee of the Histadrut as chief absorption coordinator.

Advancing the peace process is one of Messele's priorities in the Knesset. "I intend to be a fighting opposition," he says. "Only pressure can move peace forward."

For Messele, peace is also a factor in fostering immigration to Israel. "One of the main stumbling blocks to immigration is the security issue," he says. "If Israel and the Arab states succeed in bringing peace to the region, then Israel will be more attractive to new immigrants."

Absorption, however, he notes, is not only "getting a mortgage and financial aid, finding a job. The ability to integrate and be part of Israeli society is more important. Unfortunately, this is made more difficult because of prejudice and stigma."

For the Ethiopian community, this has also meant having to cope with racism.

"There are laws against incitement to racism in Israel, but there is no law to protect citizens against racism," says Messele.

"For example, a private kindergarten can refuse to accept Ethiopian children just because they are Ethiopian and there is no law against this. Just recently, I was called by Ethiopian students at the University of Haifa who wanted to rent apartments. They phoned in response to ads in the papers and were told housing was available. When they showed up in person, suddenly the apartment was rented or the price went sky high."

But in fighting racism, Messele takes a different track from the one followed by the American civil rights movement. He believes that legislation is not always the answer.

"I am debating whether to propose a law in the Knesset to protect citizens from racism. It seems absurd to enact such legislation. What good would it do to send an Ethiopian child to a kindergarten where he was not wanted? I would prefer for the school to be persuaded to accept and welcome Ethiopian children. It's good to have laws, but you really have to change the attitudes of society.

"When you ask Israelis about Ethiopians, they immediately think of problems. We have to prove ourselves by breaking the stereotypes, by changing facts and by doing. Israeli society doesn't know the strength of the Ethiopian community. They don't know about our motivation and successes.

"There is tremendous potential among our youth to advance and achieve things. Today, we have more than 1,00 Ethiopian students studying in Israeli universities, and next year, we expect to add an additional 450. One hundred percent of our young people are drafted into the army. There are no shirkers. Of the 500 currently serving, more than 50 are officers. Their success has been phenomenal. This shows their strong desire to integrate into Israeli society."

Professor raised more questions than answers

By ZEV GOLAN
WZPS

"The next world does not interest me in the least," said the old man with the big black yarmulke in one of Jerusalem's most prominent synagogues.

Yeshayahu Leibowitz was nothing if not provocative; he seemed to live for controversy. In the world-according-to-Leibowitz, David Ben-Gurion, Golda Meir and Yitzhak Shamir, the political right and the left, the army and the rabbinate were all pilloried. His lectures were performances and his audience was thrilled even as it was shocked.

What can you say about a 91-year-old professor who died? Two years ago, just before Rosh Hashanah, the Israeli daily Ma'ariv ran a full-page headline: "Death of the Giant of the Spirit and the Angry Prophet," and devoted pages 3 and 4 to the man.

Leibowitz was born in Riga. He and his sister, Bible scholar Nehama Leibowitz, today in her late 80s, were educated by private tutors. Leibowitz studied in Berlin and moved to Eretz Israel as a doctor with his wife Greta in 1935. He never practiced medicine, but at the Hebrew University, Leibowitz taught biochemistry, neurophysiology, history and philosophy. Outside academia, his religious shiurim on Maimonides regularly encompassed Kant, Wittgenstein, quantum mechanics and Islamic philosophy.

Leibowitz's method was Socratic. He raised more questions than he answered, and he forced the inquisitive to ask the right questions. "Why is suicide religiously forbidden?" a longtime student asked. "Why is mixing meat and milk forbidden?" Leibowitz "answered." "Before," muttered the student, "I had five tons on my shoulders. Now I have 50."

Leibowitz thundered imperiously at poor questions, and these legendary verbal lashings were surprisingly effective: He forced his students to think, to scrutinize every concept and category, to pass their thoughts through the steel sieve of logic.

His message was yet more complex than his method. His religiously observant devotees, for the most part, shied from his further-than-far left politics. His minions on the left had, on the other hand, almost no conception of the religious teachings which had led some to say that he knew more about the philosophy of Maimonides than Maimonides. Is there a Unified Leibowitz Theory?

Leibowitz's life was unified by its service to God. Three hundred and sixty-five days a year for almost 60 years, Jerusalemites saw their eventually stooped-over professor walking to morning prayers at the Jeshurun Synagogue. No, this isn't easy, he'd say, pointing out that the first words of the Shulchan Aruch, code of Jewish law, are not "Get up and worship" but "Overcome in order to worship." Nor did Leibowitz pray in order to inform God of his needs. He prayed, he said, in order to fulfil the commandment to pray.

Leibowitz spoke everywhere he was invited, met everyone who needed, answered telephoned questions late into the night. A chain-smoking young kibbutznik appeared at his home. Do you really think it possible, the soul-racked kibbutznik asked, to form a connection to God? Leibowitz looked at his interlocutor and considered, then said: "If you refrain from smoking on the Sabbath because God commanded it, you will have created that connection."

Riding to Leibowitz's funeral, one man confided that only Leibowitz gave him the strength to remain religious after the Holocaust. "I stopped believing in God after the Holocaust," one former Supreme Court Justice once complained, in an anecdote Leibowitz loved to tell. "Then you never believed in God," replied the professor. Leibowitz adamantly refused to believe in "an old white-bearded man in Heaven who pulls strings" for man on earth. In Leibowitz's world, God does not exist to serve man, man exists to serve God.

"Acceptance of the Heavenly yoke is not knowledge I have about Heaven but a commitment" to Heaven, he said. The Torah "is not a book that imparts knowledge, it makes demands." Therefore the next world was of no importance to Leibowitz, for what mattered to him was observing commandments in this world.

Leibowitz raised many questions

And what, he was once asked, if fulfilling the commandments becomes nothing more than habit? "Is it a small matter, then," he answered, "that a person decides to take upon himself this habit?"

Leibowitz, following Maimonides, refused to allow for any description of God, declaring that "true knowledge of God is knowing that we cannot know or describe Him." "Doesn't this empty God of meaning," he was asked, "leaving us serving God, but at the end, what did we serve?"

'That is the sum of man'

Leibowitz: "You didn't spend the years running after vanities, after idols." And anything other than God, any worldly thing, is idol-worship.

Throughout all 12 chapters of the Biblical book of Koheleth, Leibowitz noted, the author Ecclesiastes searches for the good. The book concludes: "After all is said and done, fear God and observe His commandments, for that is the sum of man." Note, Leibowitz insisted, Ecclesiastes does not say "for that is good," rather — that is the sum of man. "Because nothing in this world is good," Leibowitz sighed.

Leibowitz's great accomplishment is having defined a faith possible in an existential world where God sometimes seems absent, good altogether lacking, meaning lost. Belief, according to Leibowitz, does not say anything about God, good, reward or meaning. Belief describes the believer.

Leibowitz served God when he analyzed the brain's chemistry, when he pushed for peace, when for the last three decades he could be found at midnight every Saturday night reading Plato or Aristotle or Judah Halevi with former students.

When asked by a young man "What's the meaning of life, if you die at the end?" Leibowitz answered quietly, "To have 60 or 70 or 80 years to serve God, what more can you ask for?"

Basketball team raised local spirits

By BONNIE ROCHMAN
WZPS

UPPER GALILEE — In mid-April 1996, as Hezbollah's Katyusha rockets rained down on the north of Israel, David Blatt called a team meeting.

Blatt, the American-born coach of Israel's northernmost professional basketball team, gathered his players together in a gym only 200 metres from where a missile had landed several days before, and gave them the option to leave.

"It was right before the playoffs," Blatt recalls. "People were very nervous, but we decided to stay and gut it out."

Galil Elyon (Upper Galilee) ended up making the final four as a result of that decision and, even more important, raised the spirits of the battered region, which lies only miles from the Lebanese border.

"We put the team on a bus and travelled every morning to different shelters to visit kids and boost morale," says Blatt, who is originally from Boston. "It lent something special to the team. It bonded us. And it has a real positive effect on the kids."

With looks of awe on their faces, children shyly handed over scraps of paper for the team to autograph.

"We tried to show them that as a team we stay strong and win and that we hope they do the same," says Blatt, who, along with the players, handed out boardgames to children and answered questions.

Visiting the children was one way for Blatt and the team to set an example, outside of competition.

"To me, basketball is more than just a game," says Blatt. "Sports figures need to set an example for youth in health, fair play, goal-setting and achievement."

On the court, Blatt, decked out in a red sweatshirt emblazoned with both the Fila emblem and Galil Elyon written in Hebrew, speaks in English for the benefit of the three American players.

After graduating from Princeton University in 1981, Blatt moved to Israel, where he played on the U.S. Maccabiah team that won the championship that year, and signed a three-year contract to play for Maccabi Haifa, one of 12 professional teams in Israel.

When his contract ended, Blatt left for Atlanta, where he went to work for Xerox. But he missed being in Israel, where he had mastered Hebrew and felt part of society.

"In the United States, people in the street are very friendly and polite but are more closed and reluctant to take you in. Here it's the opposite."

He also appreciated the enthusiasm Israelis showed for athletics. "Israelis really like sports. They're vocal sports fans — not passive — and very opinionated."

In 1986 he returned and spent the next seven years playing for teams in Jerusalem, Netanya, the upper Galilee and Hadera, where he tore his Achilles tendon badly enough to end to his career. Shortly after that, he accepted an offer to become assistant coach of Galil. When the head coach was let go, Blatt found himself in charge only 11 games into the 1993-1994 season.

Money problems forced him to release all the players at the end of the next season and Galil Elyon had to start from scratch. He began building a team of young players, except for the captain, American Andrew Kennedy, Blatt's Galil Elyon teammate in 1988-1989.

Within a short time, Blatt had put the upper Galilee on the map for reasons other than politics. Galil Elyon did so well that it qualified for the prestigious European Cup Winners Cup, a league of teams mostly from Europe that finished at the top of their leagues.

On top of that, Blatt was named Israel's Coach of the Year.

Jewish life is thriving in Chile

By JERRY RICHMOND
Special to The CJN

I recently attended an Orthodox Jewish wedding, which joined a young couple of the Israel and Magendzo families in Chile. Life cycle events such as these, rich in the religious and cultural traditions of our people, sustain and enhance Jewish life in this nation on the southwestern Pacific fringe of the South American continent.

Most of Chile's Jewish population is concentrated in the Santiago metropolitan area. A recent demographic survey determined the Jewish population of Santiago totals some 19,700 persons out of a metropolitan population of 4.5 million.

There are also smaller Jewish communities in the coastal Valparaiso/Vina urban area and in the provincial centres of Conception and Temuco. However, the capital, Santiago, dominates Jewish and general affairs in this nation of 14 million.

Chile has a variety of Jewish religious and communal organizations, similar to Canada. The 75th Anniversary Yearbook of "WIZO in Chile," which was issued in 1995, indicates that the first WIZO organization in Latin America was established in Chile in 1925. In 1993, Santiago hosted the Latin American WIZO Congress.

Most of the Jews of greater Santiago are business people, professionals or academics.

The community supports a variety of synagogues from small Orthodox shuls to larger Ashkenazi or Sephardi congregations. The main Sephardi synagogue is an impressive modern building on Avenida Lyon in the Providencia district of Santiago. The current Chilean president, Eduardo Frei, attended a memorial service at this synagogue after the tragic Jewish centre bombings in Buenos Aires, in July 1994.

While in Santiago, I had the privilege of attending several Shabbat morning services at the Shephardi Kohel Jafetz Jaim Congregation in the Providencia district. The siddur, used by this congregation, contains alternate pages in Hebrew and Spanish. It was published in Buenos Aires. The Hebrew-Spanish Chumash was jointly published in Tel Aviv and Buenos Aires.

The service and melodies, except for the companion use of Spanish, were remarkably similar to those used by the Orthodox congregation I attend in Toronto. The themes of the rabbi's (el rabino in Spanish) sermon, delievered in Spanish with abundant Hebrew references, followed similar themes as those heard in a Canadian synagogue.

Kosher meat is available locally under the auspices of the Vaad Hakashrut Comunidad Israelita de Santiago, and there are facilities for kosher catering. Kosher products from Israel, Argentina and America are available.

The Santiago community also supports a Hebrew day school system. Many young Chilean Jews experience a visit to Israel during their high school years.

There is an Estadio Israelita, in the Las Condes district of the capital, with a variety of athletic and social programs, which is the equivalent of a North American JCC.

Jewish community buildings in Chile and Latin America seen from the street are "low key" affairs and are usually surrounded by walls and gates, as are most other public buildings. There are no notable exterior signs or symbols identifying them as Jewish institutions. This is in keeping with the general low key public stance of the Jewish community in this predominantly Catholic country.

I walked past Santiago's main Sephardi synagogue several times, but until this building was identified to me by friends, I was unaware of its identity. For CJN readers wishing to visit Jewish institutions in Chile, local friends would prove invaluable. An alternative would be to contact Jewish community officials or organizations, prior to arriving in the country.

Garden wedding of the Israel-Magendzo families in Santiago, Chile.

There are security concerns, although Chilean friends and hosts did not speak of hostile or anti-Semitic acts in Chile. In their day-to-day professional and business dealings Santiago's Jews appear to be well accepted.

Jews speak fondly of the climate, superb local fruits and vegetables, wines and quality of life in Chile. Local universities maintain high academic and professional standards which are recognized abroad. Young Jews receive their academic and professional training both locally and abroad.

During my March visit, Santiago's major daily, El Mercurio, gave prominent coverage, with photos, of the visit of Israel's minister of Agriculture and a reception in his honor at the Israeli Embassy. The local Jewish weekly, la palabra [word] israelita, also covered the visit to Chile of Abraham Burg, president of the Jewish Agency, and his meeting with the Chilean president.

There also appears to be a vibrant and diverse local Jewish press in Santiago.

Archeological finds mark Zippori's place in history

By WALTER ZANGER
World Zionist Press Service

A magnificent mosaic, describing scenes from the life and cult of the God Dionysos, discovered on the floor of the banquet hall of a luxurious third century Roman residence at Zippori in 1987. [WZPS photo by Douglas Guthrie]

With the recent discovery of an entire synagogue floor depicting scenes from the Bible and from Temple ritual, a zodiac and the Holy Ark, Zippori is finally able to offer convincing evidence of its place in Jewish history.

Although the city in the lower western Galilee was the centre of Jewish life — the seat of the Sanhedrin (Holy Council) — and the place where Rabbi Judah HaNasi edited the Mishnah (the foundation of the Talmud) in 200 CE, physical evidence of Zippori as a Jewish city was lacking.

A fragment of synagogue mosaic was discovered during Zippori's earliest excavations in 1909, but not until this more recent discovery was Zippori's place in Jewish history confirmed once and for all. The mosaic, designed in a single long carpet, features scenes from the Bible, scenes relating to Temple ritual, a zodiac, the Holy Ark with a seven-branched menorah on either side of it and lions.

As the largest city in the Galilee in the days of Jesus, Zippori, which was turned into a national park in 1992, grew and prospered for centuries, undisturbed by war or revolution. When serious excavations began at the site in 1931, the first great discovery was a 5,000-seat Roman theatre.

This is the second thread of the city's history: Zippori as a pagan Roman city called Diocaesarea. The pro-Roman element of the population must have been very strong indeed in the early centuries of the Common Era, for Zippori was the only city in the Land of Israel that refused to join the Great Revolt of 66-70 CE. Josephus, the general-turned-historian, recounted how the inhabitants of Zippori threw him out when, as commander of the Jewish forces in the Galilee during the revolt, he came to Zippori to get weapons and supplies for the war.

Modern excavations, in progress since the mid-1980s, have done well by pagan Zippori. The Dionysos mosaic floor, including a side panel with the hauntingly beautiful face of a woman known as The Mona Lisa of the Galilee — the most exquisite Roman mosaic ever discovered in Israel — now rests in a luxurious third century villa, rebuilt on the original foundations.

In the lower city of Zippori, which is also excavated, is a Cardo, the colonnaded main street of the town built during the Roman period (second and third centuries CE). The ruins of a large building enclosing many mosaic floors were also uncovered east of the colonnaded road. On the floor of the largest room, a magnificent mosaic was discovered depicting the festivities held in Egypt when the Nile River reached its peak.

Just outside the town, a huge system of water tunnels, cisterns and aqueducts were recently discovered. This abundance of water explains why Zippori's inhabitants were able to grow olives, grapes and vegetables.

Zippori is now a park

The final thread is Zippori as a Christian city. Until the first century, the city, which had a population of 30,000 and was situated three miles from Nazareth, the birthplace of Jesus, was the capital of the Galilee. An old tradition sets Zippori as the birthplace of Mary, mother of Jesus (the Church of St. Anne is still there) and the place of the Anunciation. Modern Christian scholarship is extremely interested in the influence that Zippori must have exerted on Nazareth in general and on the character and ideas of Jesus and the writers of the Gospels in particular.

At this point the threads of our story become intertwined. Considering the discoveries of the past 10 years of archaeological excavation, what are we to make of a superb Dionysos mosaic laid at exactly the same time that Rabbi Judah HaNasi made the city the centre of the Jewish world? Or of the synagogue lintel inscribed with a dedication to the heads of the Jewish community of Sidon, at the end of which are the two Greek letters, CHI RO, a classical abbreviation for Jesus Christ? Or of a Jewish home in the upper city with no fewer than four mikvas (Jewish ritual baths), in the basement of which one finds pagan statues of Pan and Prometheus? Or a coin, unique in ancient numismatics, which bears the inscription: "Diocaesarea, the holy city, city of refuge, loyal friendship and alliance between the Sanhedrin and the Senate of the Roman people"?

The interesting conclusion is that in Zippori one finds it impossible to define the borders between Jewish, Christian and Pagan eras. They all seemed to have lived together in the same city.

With Zippori becoming one of Israel's most popular national parks, attracting approximately 150,000 visitors each year, the National Parks Authority continues extensive developments at the site. The Crusader fortress now serves as an information centre, featuring a film about the city's history, an exhibit of archaeological finds and computerized multi-media stations introducing visitors to the mosaics and water supply system. Walkways have been created within the Roman reservoir for visitors; a special building to house the Nile mosaic is under construction; and the synagogue floor is now being restored by the Israel Museum.

Much remains to be done, but the Parks Authority, with funding from the Israel Government Tourist Corporation, the Jewish National Fund and the Galilee Foundation, is sure to offer the public visiting Zippori, a fascinating look at an unusual city.

Urban planning requires . . .

By GAIL LICHTMAN
Special to The CJN

Urban planning and development arouse controversy even under ideal circumstances, all the more so when they take place in a historic city where the tension between preserving the past and meeting the needs of the future can sometimes seem at almost irreconcilable odds.

Jerusalem is steeped in 3,000 years of history. It is a city holy to three religions — Judaism, Christianity and Islam — a place whose very stones have been imbued with a sanctity of their own and whose streets and neighborhoods evoke deep-seated emotional responses.

Yet at the same time, Jerusalem is the capital and largest city of the State of Israel; a modern town whose population has grown by 32 percent in the past decade and is now approaching 600,000.

This means that Jerusalem, whose population is expected to reach about 680,000 by the year 2000, will need more housing, more schools, more roads and more businesses in order to meet the needs of its increasing populace.

Massive development is already underway. The Jerusalem Development Authority, the independent statutory body jointly established in 1989 by the Jerusalem municipality and the Israeli government to initiate and promote development in the city, is currently directing more than $1 billion (U.S.) worth of projects in real estate, transportation and industry.

But how does one preserve the unique, historic nature of Jerusalem while providing the city with all the needs of a modern capital and an international city?

"The conservation of the many layers of heritage, culture and life which have accumulated in the historical cities of the world is a problem which ... affects the daily lives of their populations," says Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert.

Some historic cities, such as Florence and Venice, have opted for the museum approach, foregoing development to the point where their historic hearts are tourist mecas, not living urban centres.

At the other extreme are cities such as Cairo and Istanbul, which have almost totally lost or destroyed their historic quarters.

In the middle are those cities that are trying to integrate the demands of modern life with the historic, ideal vision of their past, like Paris, Rome, Amsterdam and Barcelona.

Jerusalem has chosen the middle path.

One of its most successful preservation projects is Nahalat Shiva, one of the first neighborhoods built outside the Old City walls. Slated for demolition in the 1970s, the area was instead renovated and turned into a charming centre of cafes, restaurants and shops, while retaining its architectural uniqueness.

"Nahalat Shiva is beautiful, authentic, real and alive," says David Guggenheim of Jerusalem-based Guggenheim and Bloch Architects and Urbanists, who also co-chaired the recent third Jerusalem Conference on Heritage — Making Historic Cities Livable.

"The past is the basis of the future," he says.

Nowhere is this more apparent than the new City Hall Square. Inaugurated in June 1993, it successfully integrates 11 renovated historical buildings with two brand new structures. Similarly, the soon-to-be-completed Mamilla project combines its pedestrian mall and new commercial area with several historic buildings. The Russian compound project next to city hall will also continue in this tradition, in which several 19th century historic treasures will be integrated with a number of new hotels and office buildings.

The city is also trying to give greater definition to its role as the nation's capital. To this end, a new national precinct is being built which will concentrate all government buildings in one area. A facelift to the main entrance of the city and an upgraded road transportation system will also help bring Jerusalem into line with 21st century expectations of a modern, capital city.

The main conflicts over preservation concern the historic downtown area. Built in the late 19th century as Jerusalem expanded outward from the walled Old City, it is now an area of small businesses, restaurants and cafes.

"Today, the emphasis on the downtown area is on upgrading, more than preservation, with an eye towards turning it into an important tourism centre," says Nira Sidi, director of the Planning Policy Department of the Jerusalem municipality. "But there are clearly pressures to develop more."

So how does the city balance these pressures?

Traffic is one area of contention. Environmentalists have long been delicate balance in Jerusalem

pushing for a nearly total ban on private vehicles in the narrow downtown streets and intensive upgrading of public transportation, including a light rail system. But despite this, and despite an outcry from the Society for the Protection on Nature in Israel, plans are going ahead for widening the historic Neviim Street to serve as a main traffic artery through the town centre.

Environmentalists are also enraged that the city is in the process of re-examining its once sacrosanct policy with respect to multi-storey buildings, especially in the downtown area.

For years, a maximum of six to eight storeys was the rule, in order not to harm the esthetic composition of Jerusalem's old neighborhoods or to dwarf the walls of the Old City.

Today, the municipality is considering 12- to 15-storey towers as a way to meet its growing needs.

"Building multi-storey towers is very dangerous if you don't check out the overall expression of these buildings on the skyline, the neighborhoods and the climate," says Guggenheim. "I believe that development can go on without multi-storey buildings in the downtown area. They should be limited to the periphery where they won't clash with the city's historic character."

In Guggenheim's opinion, the answer lies in the creation of an international body to explore the various long-term possibilities for the city, a group which can act as a counterweight to some of the pressures local politicians are subject to from developers and entrepreneurs. In the 1970s, former mayor Teddy Kollek created the Jerusalem committee to advise City Hall on building and development. Guggenheim envisions something along similar lines.

"Our aim is to create an international group for an in-depth exploration of the problems of historic cities, not just Jerusalem."

Sidi has similar feelings with respect to the green areas: "A national plan would give the city the backing it needs in preserving these areas."

Sidi also feels that Jerusalem may eventually have to limit its growth. "There is definitely enough land for development until 2010. But beyond that, maybe we have to find an optional size and then leave further development to the towns and cities on Jerusalem's periphery. You can't create New York here."

Despite the problems, Olmert is confident that the essence of the city will remain despite massive development.

"The magic and uniqueness that is Jerusalem will still be with us," he says. "But we have to adjust to fit 21st century life."

What a difference a year makes

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Last Rosh Hashanah, then prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, in his gravelly voice and straightforward prose, delivered the traditional end-of-year message from the premier to the citizens of Israel and to Jews around the world.

That memory alone is enough to render such overworked epithets as "traumatic" and "dramatic" hopelessly inadequate to describe Israel's just-ending year, 5756.

One year later, Rabin is gone, his government is gone and the future of his peace policies is in question.

A new leader, the Likud's Benjamin Netanyahu, swept into office under a new electoral system, he holds out the promise of "peace with security," coupled with economic prosperity.

As Israelis and Jews abroad make their individual and collective annual soul-searchings on the eve of Rosh Hashanah 5757, the path ahead, which seemed so clear a year ago, is now shrouded in uncertainty.

"Who would have thought?" is perhaps the only phrase, however hackneyed, that remotely conveys the cataclysm that the Jewish state has undergone during these past 12 months.

Who would have thought that a prime minister of Israel would be gunned down by a fellow Jew?

Who would have thought that the famed Shin Bet, Israel's domestic security service, would let it happen?

Or that it would happen, as though choreographed, just at the end of a demonstration in the heart of Tel Aviv that marked the largest-ever outpouring of public support for Rabin and his policy of peace with the Palestinians?

Or that his successor, Shimon Peres, riding a great wave of public sympathy that welled up after the assassination, would fritter away his commanding lead and eventually lose the election to the Likud's young and inexperienced candidate, Netanyahu?

When Rabin made his Rosh Hashanah broadcast a year ago, no one dreamed, of course, that he would be assassinated.

Nor did anyone – except perhaps his killer, Yigal Amir – seriously dream that Rabin's term in office would be cut short.

Granted, Israel was riven with discord over his peace policies. The political right, including large sections of the religious camp, were outraged about the steady process of transferring powers to Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority.

In October, Israeli troops began withdrawing from the West Bank town of Jenin, the first of six Palestinian population centres in the West Bank that were transferred to Arafat's control before the end of December.

Demonstrators branded the prime minister a traitor; extremist rabbis cursed his name.

But the polls still showed a majority of Israelis supporting the prime minister.

And Rabin, angered but not cowed by his critics, pressed ahead with dogged determination, winning accolades from an admiring international community that felt that it was finally seeing peace come to one of the world's most volatile regions.

In the Middle East itself, Israel's success in opening up formal ties with several Arab states was the most cogent evidence that something was radically changing.

Even a wave of terror bombings earlier in the year that had threatened to destroy the peace process seemed to have abated.

But the assassination, on Saturday night, Nov. 4, turned everything around.

Looking back on the chain of events that it triggered, it becomes ever clearer that Peres, seasoned statesman and skillful politician though he was, never properly re-

Peres' blunders helped lead to his defeat covered from his own near-brush with death.

Amir, who was later convicted and sentenced to life, confirmed at his trial that he would have also shot Peres, had the then-foreign minister not left the parking lot moments before Rabin arrived.

In the months after the assassination, Peres made a series of blunders that, coupled with a new murderous wave of terror bombings, robbed him and his Labor party of power.

First, he declined to call a snap election in the immediate aftermath of the assassination. He said he wanted to stabilize a potentially volatile situation. Sources close to him also felt that he did not want to be seen as winning on the coattails of the martyred Rabin.

But Peres did not stick to his guns.

In February, citing the fragility of the governing coalition, he instructed his party to enter into talks with the Likud on advancing the elections to the summer. May 29 was eventually set as the date for the general elections.

Then disaster struck.

On Feb. 25, a suicide bomber killed 26 innocent people when he detonated a bomb aboard the No. 18 bus on Jaffa Road, central Jerusalem's main thoroughfare.

Hours later, a suicide bomber in Ashkelon killed one and wounded 31 others.

The next day, a car driven by an Arab American tourist plowed into a group of people at a bus stop in Jerusalem, killing one and injuring 22.

One week later, on the very same No. 18 bus route in Jerusalem, another suicide bomber claimed 19 innocent lives.

And the next day, on the eve of Purim, a suicide bomber killed 13 innocent people, including children, at Dizengoff Centre in the heart of Tel Aviv.

A wave of profound horror, revulsion and bitter frustration swept the nation.

Responsibility for all the attacks was claimed by Hamas, an Islamic fundamentalist movement that bitterly opposed Arafat's conciliation with Israel.

In retrospect, Peres attributed his electoral defeat – by less than 30,000 votes – to those bombings and to the Likud's slick campaign strategy.

Outside observers, however, also lay the blame on Labor, and specifically on Peres himself, for the party's haughty a lackluster campaign.

In addition, Labor's alliance with the staunchly secularist Meretz party is thought to have alienated even those relatively few Orthodox voters who might otherwise have favored Peres over Netanyahu.

Peres may also have blundered in the run-up to the elections by escalating a periodic flare-up of fighting across the Israeli-Lebanese border into Operation Grapes of Wrath, the April 11to 26 bombardment of targets throughout Lebanon by the Israeli army, navy and air force.

The April 23 shelling of the Kana UN camp in southern Lebanon, resulting in the deaths of at least 91 Lebanese refugees, also caused deep resentment among Israeli Arab voters – enough, in the view of some observers, to cost Peres the election.

When May 29 rolled around, Israeli voters for the first time were able to cast two ballots: one for prime minister, the other for a party in the separate Knesset race.

Israeli voters, enabled for the first time to split their vote between the party of their choice and their candidate for premier, did so with a vengeance.

A new immigrant-rights party, Yisrael b'Aliyah, led by former Soviet refusenik Natan Sharansky, came from nowhere to capture seven seats in the 120-seat Knesset.

The single-issue Third Way party, hotly opposed to a withdrawal from the Golan Heights in exchange for a peace treaty with Syria, took four seats.

And three Orthodox parties – Shas, the National Religious Party and the United Torah Judaism bloc – collectively increased their number of Knesset seats to 23 and all won a place in the governing coalition.

The newfound power of the three parties is likely to mean a blow to non-Orthodox aspirations for religious pluralism in Israel.

The basic policy guidelines of the new government pledge legislation requiring all conversions to Judaism carried out in Israel to be validated by the Orthodox chief rabbinate. The Reform and Conservative movements had hoped that a Supreme Court ruling on this issue earlier in the year might lead to the recognition of non-Orthodox conversions in Israel.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak assembled 21 of the 22 Arab League members in June to present a united front against what they perceived would be the hardline intransigence of the Netanyahu government.

Netanyahu managed to assuage those fears somewhat when he began holding his first rounds of meetings with Arab leaders in mid-July.

His meeting with Mubarak in Cairo on July 18 – exactly one month after he presented his government to the Knesset – concluded with an air of unexpected optimism.

Similarly, a meeting held the next week between Foreign Minister David Levy and Arafat was replete with statements that the peace process would progress.

Whether such optimism will be borne out by facts on the ground is the largest question looming over the Middle East as the new year begins.

Rabbi hopes to help revive Siberian communities

BY LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

KRASNOYARSK, SIBERIA – In 1881, Abram Shalyt was exiled to Siberia from the town of Senno, in what was then Byelorussia, for making an attempt on the life of the local mayor.

More than a century later, his grandson, Semyon, came to the synagogue in his native Krasnoyarsk to see Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, who has served as the spiritual leader of Russian Jewry since 1995. Semyon Shalyt, a 78-year-old retired doctor, was excited. He had not seen a rabbi since childhood.

"Once a day, and two times on the Sabbath, I would take my grandfather to the synagogue," Shalyt recalled. "My grandfather lost his vision at hard labor, so I would go with him."

For Rabbi Steinsaltz, his trip to Krasnoyarsk, located in central Siberia, was a first. It took him to several Jewish communities in Siberia and the Russian Far East, as part of an ongoing effort to visit Jewish communities outside of Moscow.

But until then, he had never had the chance to visit such remote places as Yekaterinburg in the Ural Mountains, Omsk and Krasnoyarsk in Siberia, or Khabarovsk in the Far East.

"I wanted to visit these remote communities," which, Rabbi Steinzaltz said, "are neither very much alive nor dead."

He said he was surprised by the numbers of Jews in each of the communities he visited.

"I didn't know that in a place like Khabarovsk there are an estimated 10,000 to 14,000 Jews," he said.

Each of the three other towns Rabbi Steinzaltz visited has a Jewish population of from 6,000 to 15,000.

Organized by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), the tour was made possible with the help of U.S. Ambassador Ronald Lauder, who has supported Jewish communal projects in Eastern and Central Europe through the foundation that bears his name.

Deluged with questions

For example, Lauder provided a plane for the trip to the far-flung Jewish communities.

"The towns we visited had been chosen because of the level of activities in these communities and because those were the places where the plane could land," said Ralph Goldman, an honorary executive vice-president with the JDC who, along with a small group of American Jewish leaders, accompanied Rabbi Steinsaltz on the trip.

Wherever Rabbi Steinzaltz went, his audiences deluged him with questions. What does Judaism say about mixed marriages? Can a Jewish woman wear seductive clothes? What does the Jewish religion say about the Holocaust? Does the creating of the State of Israel mean that the Messiah will soon come?

Rabbi Steinzaltz gave his lectures in Hebrew.

In Khabarovsk, a grandfather and a grandson who were in the audience listened attentively, quietly repeating words the rabbi spoke. Because of his early training in the Talmud and his native Yiddish, the grandfather could understand snatches of the rabbi's lecture without benefit of a Russian translation.

His 11-year-old grandson explained that he understood parts of the lecture because he had just finished studying the first part of a Hebrew textbook.

Rabbi Steinzaltz' name became familiar to Russian Jews in the late 1980s, when 70 years of state-sponsored religious persecution ended and Judaism was allowed to be studied openly.

Russian translations of books by Rabbi Steinzaltz were among the first works on Judaism that appeared in the country in the new period of openness instituted by former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev.

Rabbi Steinsaltz said he hoped his visit would contribute toward a revival of the sense of Jewish community.

"The community here has lost its collective identity," Rabbi steinzaltz said, adding that it was his mission to help restore it.

The history of the Jews in Siberia and the Russian Far East is very different from that in other parts of Russia. Most of the Siberian Jewish families could trace their roots to someone who had been sent into exile during the Czarist regime or as a result of the Stalinist purges that were first carried out in the 1930s.

Siberian Jews are "exiles from the exile," said Rabbi Yechiel Poupko, of Chicago who made the trip with Rabbi steinzaltz.

The grandparents of Isaak Kaufman were exiled to Siberia from Ukraine and Byelorussia in 1905.

"My grandfather and grandmother were both activists with the Bund, the Jewish socialist party. Here they met each other," said Kaufman, 60, who serves as chair of the Society of Jewish Culture in Krasnoyarsk.

"Our ancestors' fate left its mark upon us, the Jews of Siberia," Kaufman said. "I think we are more open, more straightforward than other Russian Jews."

A member of Rabbi Steinzaltz' family had also been exiled to Siberia at the turn of the century.

"He spent 20 years in Siberia, and I imagine he didn't have to pay for his ticket," Rabbi Steinzaltz said.

Most members of the Jewish community in Khabarovsk, the biggest in the Russian Far East, moved there earlier this century after the failure of a Soviet plan to create a Jewish autonomous area in Birobidzhan, which is located 130 miles from Khabarovsk.

For the Jews of Siberia, Rabbi Steinzaltz said he believes there was at least one advantage in living some four to seven time zones east of Moscow.

"It seems that Siberia was more tolerant to Jews," he said. "Jews had better chances in Siberia. I can see here and there that people hold positions or have a power that goes beyond what they have in other places" in Russia.

Wherever he visited, Rabbi Steinzaltz was received by local governmental officials.

"It was very important to us to see how the rabbi was received. The authorities, the general public and the press were taking our spiritual leader as the ambassador of the entire Jewish people," said Mark Arshinsky, a Jewish communal leader in Khabarovsk.

In every town Rabbi Steinsaltz travelled to, local authorities provided police escorts for him; dozens of reporters and camera people were also on hand, attempting to record his stay in the provinces.

"After all, very few guests from abroad, not to mention Jewish leaders, visit our provincial town," said Alexey Karlin, an 18-year-old art student in Khabarovsk.

"I heard many people saying that Rabbi Steinzaltz was the first rabbi they have ever seen in their life," said Arshinsky.

"Now they know that there are Jews who want to help us find our nearly lost Jewish identity."

Poet was unique product of post-Holocaust Europe

By BARUCH COHEN

Recently, a good friend brought me a small booket printed in Bucharest in 1970 (the Ceausescu era). The booklet reads, modestly, Versuri — Paul Celan. It comprises 129 poems (Celan wrote 800), with translation by Peter Solomon and Nina Cassian.

Not one single word about the author, no information, no preface. Not one biographical note.

Paul Celan, born Paul Antshel in 1920 in Cernowitz, Bukovina, was a German-speaking Jew who mastered several European languages, including French. He translated the works of Apollinaire, Valéry, Rimbaud and others from French to German. And he chose to write all his 800 poems in German.

His father had Orthodox and Zionist convictions, and sent his son to a Hebrew school administrated by the Bund-Socialist group called Safa Ivria. At age 16, Celan's interests took a decidedly secular turn, to his father's regret. His mother, Celan's idol, inspired in him the love of the German language and of German literature. German was the tongue chosen for him by his mother and the one in which he wrote his earliest poems.

After the Holocaust, Celan's affiliation with German expressed what he most longed for, to preserve the memory of his childhood, and especially of his mother. "Only in the mother tongue can one speak his own truth. In a foreign tongue the poet lies."

Lately, a number of books are finally giving Celan the stature he deserves. On Sept. 30, 1984, in the New York Times Book Review, the well-known critic George Steiner deplored the fact that Celan was not given the Nobel Prize, while other less meritorious and less important poets received it. "Paul Celan," wrote Steiner, "is a unique appearance on the firmament of Western world poetry."

One of the most profound and lyrical poets of our time, Celan was a unique product of post-Holocaust Europe. The Celans lived in Cernowitz, Bukovina, recently annexed to Romania. Celan's parents were to perish in the Transnistrian killing fields. His mother was shot to death in the cold winter — "the burning ice" — of 1943, after it was determined by her German and Romanian masters that she had become unfit for work. His father died of typhus a few months later.

When the German SS troops smashed into Cernowitz on July 5, 1941, they invaded Celan's psyche as well. The 600-year-old community was destroyed, the Great Synagogue burned and the dazed survivors roped off in the ghetto, 45 persons to an apartment. The ghetto experience lasted several weeks; Celan and his parents initially escaped several waves of deportation.

In a June 27, 1942 round-up, however, Celan managed to avoid arrest by hiding at a friend's house. When he returned home the next day, John Felstiner tells us, "the house was empty, the front door sealed and his parents gone" (John Felstiner; Paul Celan, Poet, Survivor, Jew — Yale University Press, May 1995). A month after his parents' disappearance, Celan was taken into a labor camp, which Romanian authorities had forced the Jewish community to assemble.

In late 1944, when the Nazi camps began to be dismantled and horror stories were printed daily in newspapers, Celan reportedly suffered "a severe psychic shock which he never overcame." He encountered his former classmates who, together with their families, had survived the resettlements, while his own parents had not.

It was in this time of pain, misery and uncertainty that the timbre of Celan's poetic voice became particularly pure. He had begun to write poetry in 1936, when he was 16. His early poems were full of melancholy, and romantic. One is: Mothers Day, 1938.

It was with his mother, who exposed him to German poetry, that he identified. Many of his most tragic, powerful poems are addressed to her, explicitly or implicitly. What she loved, and taught him to love, killed her when the Germans invaded:

And can you hear, Mother
As once on a time, the gentle, the German the pain-laden rhyme?

Celan wrote this in an agonizing saccharine mimicry of sentimental German verse.

Celan survived life in a forced labor camp. Many other Jews who survived had few doubts about their identity. But for Celan, to renounce German meant renouncing his mother's life in art and his own; yet to write in German meant renouncing his mother's life in the flesh and his own. He was torn, until he was able to develop his own piercing, poetic voice.

Celan, reticent, even secretive about himself, guilty for surviving, was subject to spells of sometimes violent depression and was sometimes hospitalized. This would lead, finally, in May 1970 to his suicide by drowning in the Seine River. Celan, like others (Primo Levi, Roman Gray and Jean Amery), took his own life.

After the war, in 1945, when he was 25, he came to Bucharest, where he spent two years before leaving for Paris via Vienna. I remember him saying goodbye to his friends at the Bucharest north railway station on a late autumn evening in 1947. Shortly before, at an evening of poetry reading, I was fascinated by his deep black, sad eyes while his poet friend, Romanian Peter Solomon, who translated most of his poems, read his poetry. After Solomon read Tangoul Mortii The Deathfugue, Todesfuge, Celand read the poem in German.

Poet employed Biblical images

Black milk of day break we drink it at evening
We drink it at midday and morning we drink it at night
We drink and we drink.

Celan's poetry speaks to me in a very personal and direct way. As a witness of the Nazi occupation in Bucharest, and of the "broken-glass" nights and days of January 21 to 23 1941 in Bucharest, which signaled the Romanian Jewish Holocaust, the Transnistria deportation, I feel the pain of Celan's lines:

No one witnesses for the witness.

Celan's poetry testifies to his undeniable Jewishness, with its sources in the Hebrew Bible and Jewish mysticism, as well as his close connection, even kinship, with Martin Buber, Gershon Sholem, Walter Benjamin, Heinrich Heine, Franz Kafka, Rilke, Mandelshtam and other writers and poets of the German language or whose works he translated into German.

He was also in permanent correspondence with Nelly Sachs, Holocaust survivor and Nobel Prize-winning German-Jewish poet, who movingly wrote him: "How deeply I am bound to you and your healing speech."

Celan wrote that "All poets are Yids," and "poetry is mysticism." Again and again, in many of his poems we meet Hebrew words, Biblical images:

I am you
when I am
I.

or

By the waters of Babylon it stands with us by the water when the Sabbath come
It was with us when on the banks of the stream we wrapped the Sabbath in precious linen.

In 1969, Celan journeyed to Israel. While in Jerusalem he wrote a special poem dedicated to the Israeli poet Ilana Shmueli:

There stood a splinter of fig on your lip
There stood Jerusalem around us...
I stood in you...

In another poem he exclaims:

Ashrei
a word without meaning transtibetan squired into the Jewess...

And in one of his poems he calls, in Hebrew,

"Kumi Ori — Arise, my light (my salvation).

Indeed, one can discern an Hebraic presence from the beginning to the end in Celan's work.

Today, as I research the forgotten Holocaust of Romanian Jewry, I wonder why the Transnistria tragedy is hardly mentioned by historians. I therefore consider the publication of Paul Celan: Poet, Survivor, Jew, by John Felstiner; Paul Celan — Nelly Sachs Correspondence, edited by Barbara Wiedman (Sheep Meadow Press, 1995); Language Mysticism, by Shiva Wolosky (Stanford University Press, 1995); and Poems of Paul Celan, by Michael Hamburger, (Anvil Press Poetry, 1988), key turning points in understanding the Romanian Holocaust.

"Death is a master from Germany," Celan's disturbing lines encompass not merely the ovens of Auschwitz but also, I believe, the "burning ice" of Transnistria. His life, his work and his death symbolize the epic tragedy of the German-Jewish symbiosis, of Romanian Jewry, and of East European Jewry in general. In his entirely personal, yet also widely-shared, trauma, in his fusion of psychic crisis and linguistic self-fracturing, Celan's verse incarnates the moral and esthetic dilemma which faced not only Jewish, but post-war European writing. Celan himself said, "Perhaps I am one of the last who must live out to the end the destiny of the Jewish spirit in Europe."

Days of Awe unique time in yearly cycle

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The 10 days between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are a special time.

The Days of Awe, as they are known, have a rhythm unique among the cycles of the Jewish year as a period of reflection and self-evaluation, as Jews the world over prepare for the Day of Judgment.

On Rosh Hashanah, according to Jewish tradition, God pencils each of our names into the books of life and death, deciding who will prosper and who will suffer in the coming year.

If we work hard to redeem ourselves during the next 10 days, we have a chance to change the course of events before God determines our fate on the Day of Judgment, Yom Kippur, when our future is inscribed in indelible ink.

It can be an intense time.

"It is inherently spiritually charged," said writer Francine Klagsbrun, author of Jewish Days, a forthcoming book examining important times during the year, to be published this fall by Farrar, Straus & Giroux.

"The feel of the air is different, the feel of life is different and you are more attuned to spiritual parts of life, more attuned to relationships," she said.

Rabbi Kerry Olitzky described the period as a time to consider "all that Judaism has to offer to take a good hard look at ourselves and do what needs to be done."

The 10 days are a time "to seek out people to ask for forgiveness and to make decisions about how we're going to change our lives, to ready ourselves to stand as naked souls before God," Olitzky said.

Olitzky, a Reform rabbi, with Rabbi Rachel Sabath wrote Preparing Your Heart For The High Holy Days: A Guided Journal, published recently by the Jewish Publication Society.

The rabbis of the Talmud advised that there are three ways to change our entry from being in the book of death to the book of life: prayer, charity and repentance.

A central part of repentance is taking responsibility for harmful words and deeds, and it is traditional during these first 10 days of the new year to ask forgiveness from those one has possibly hurt, in a practice known as mechila.

Some people welcome the period, and the process of asking for forgiveness, as an opportunity for reflection and self-evaluation.

Asking forgiveness is "the most moving and important part of the holiday because you take responsibility, finally," said writer Esther Broner.

"Otherwise, we're just students waiting for the report card and waiting to pass on to the next grade. This way we grade ourselves."

Another tradition of the period is Tashlich, the symbolic casting away of sins by taking crumbs out of pockets and tossing them into a natural body of water.

Broner and a group of creative feminist Jewish friends adapted that tradition for several years by building paper boats, talking about the sins that each vessel represented and sending them floating down the waters flowing around Manhattan.

"We made flotillas of sin out of paper and sent them along the Harlem River, which hardly noticed because it was so full of sin by much larger polluters," Broner said in an interview.

She wrote The Telling, the story of one of the first – and most enduring – feminist seders created by the same friends with whom she created this ritual.

But for Tashlich they were not casting out just the sins traditionally associated with the 10 days. These women reinvented the ritual from their own perspectives.

"We had to get rid of what people thought of things we had done which they considered sins, like having ambition, pride, high energy, pain, lifestyles they criticized," Broner said. "In our creative lives these things were no sin at all, but were our drive."

Participants would bake challah and then they would sing songs and dine on a festive meal eaten on a borscht-and schmaltz-stained tablecloth that had been handed down to filmmaker Lilly Rivlin from her grandmother.

"At the end we did tekiah (long shofar blows) and celebrated the birth of the world," Broner said.

Some chassidic Jews take the casting out of sin one step further, in the ritual known as kapparot, or atonement.

In the days leading up to the Day of Atonement, enormous flatbed trucks stacked with cages full of live chickens begin to park in neighborhoods inhabited by the devoutly Orthodox.

In the darkness of the night before Yom Kippur eve, the faithful crowd around the trucks to select the chicken that will serve as their personal sacrifice.

Each person takes a live chicken – men take a male bird while women take a hen – holds it by its ankles and swings it around their heads while incanting a blessing transferring their sins to the chicken.

Then the chickens are ritually slaughtered and defeathered in a building nearby whose floor runs red with entrails and blood.

The chickens are taken home to become the dinner eaten before the Yom Kippur fast, and the money that paid for them is donated to charity.

Once the 10 days are over, though, what happens to all the work that people have done on themselves and their relationships, and all the good intentions to do things differently in the coming year?

"The Kotzker rebbe once said that the hardest part of the binding of Isaac [for Abraham] was coming down the mountain," after Abraham had decided to heed God's command to kill his son, said Wolpe.

"That's true of the high holidays, too. People think the Yom Kippur fasting is hard but it's carrying the message past the day that is really hard.

"The 10 days are a time to build up so that when you come down the mountain, as it were, you come down with some momentum."

Russian students get taste of Jewish studies

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN & BERNARD ZELECHOW

At a conference on Jewish studies held in Moscow last winter, Prof. Michael Brown, the director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, met Prof. Oleg Budnitskii of Rostov State Pedagogical University. They discussed the possibility of a formal link between the two universities.

In March, Brown asked the two of us whether we would be willing to lecture in Rostov-on-Don as representatives of the centre. We confess that we said yes before we understood what would be in store for us in Russian Cossack country, close to the war in Chechnya. Less than two months later we arrived in Rostov for what would prove to be an academically successful and personally rewarding stay.

With the assistance of the Canadian International Development Agency and the Association of Colleges and Universities in Canada, we spent a week in Rostov meeting with professors, undergraduate and graduate students and senior university administrators. We both lectured on academic topics of Judaica to student groups and faculty seminars in History and Sociology. One of us (Martin Lockshin) also gave three lectures in the local synagogue — two of them in Hebrew. (A number of Jews gather regularly in the Rostov synagogue to study the Hebrew language.) And one of us (Bernard Zelechow) gave a large lecture to hundreds of students and faculty about university life in Canada.

Professor Martin Lockshin lecturing in the Rostov synagogue.

Jewish life in the former Soviet Union is still precarious and marginalized. It is a mere six years since Russian Jews have had an opportunity to investigate the Jewish past openly. To date most explorations of Jewish identity have been sponsored by religious organizations and have met with limited success. In the former Soviet Union, where religion was successfully stifled, no religious institution has made more than limited inroads in the public consciousness.

Many Russians still tend to equate religion with ideology and because of their experiences in the 20th century, they are suspicious of all ideologies. Jewish studies programs in the universities akin to the North American models, then, appear to be a potentially effective way of promoting Jewish identity in Russia,

Jewish subject matter has been introduced into the Russian history curriculum at the Rostov universities under Budnitskii's leadership. Even with the recent liberalization, however, Jewish content in the curriculum is accepted reluctantly. We felt — as did our hosts — that we contributed significantly to the legitimation of Jewish studies in Rostov. That Westerners connected to a public university, who are much admired in some Russian university circles, were presented as teaching "Judaism" greatly enhanced the status of Jewish studies.

There is a dual purpose to the promotion of Jewish studies in Russian universities: the survival and revival of Jewish identity among Jews; and the dissemination of Jewish knowledge among the non-Jewish intellectual community comprised of faculty and students. There is a particular value in cooperating with Rostov State Pedagogical University, because it is responsible for training primary and secondary school teachers for the whole Don region.

The misinformation among faculty and students about Jews was very troubling. In the question period at the end of one of our lectures, one graduate student asked publicly whether it was not true that some sects of Jews indulge in the ritual murder of Christian babies! Yet another student cornered the lecturer afterwards to ask about some supposed Jewish practices of black magic involving snakes. What is most telling about these anecdotes is that the questions came from students who were clearly sympathetic to Jews and Jewish learning. Their questions reflect the primitiveness of their knowledge.

Lectures well attended

The general level of ignorance was countered, however, by the desire among the faculty, Jewish and otherwise, to study Jewish history and culture. Our lectures were well attended and we were sought out by many faculty members — especially from History and Sociology — who wanted to discuss future cooperation and to learn about the role of religious and cultural minorities in a free society.

We were able to help in another area as well. The Rostov universities wish to explore methods of setting up multicultural programs reflecting democratic and pluralistic values in university education. This is of great significance in Russian education, where national minorities are barely tolerated and minority religions are tacitly delegitimized. Our hosts were particularly interested in the ways York faculty study minority cultures and integrate them into the university curriculum.

The most tangible result of the trip was the signing of a formal agreement between the universities to continue to cooperate in Jewish studies, the first such accord in Jewish studies between a Canadian and a Russian university. In the short run, this accord may be more immediately beneficial for the Rostov community. But Rostov faculty members are well acquainted with the rich Jewish history of Russia, an area missing from the York curriculum.

For example, one faculty member who is sympathetic to the integration of Jewish studies into Russian studies and whose specialization is in Cossack history, took the two of us to a Cossack settlement (Starocherkassk) that also houses a museum of local culture. The museum's curator served as our guide and as a gracious hostess, presiding over an elegant tea. What emerged from our tour and conversation was awareness of the complex nature of the interactions between Jews and Cossacks in the Don region — not all of them negative. We hope that our Russian colleagues will soon be able to share this kind of expertise with York students and faculty and with wider audiences here in the Jewish community of Toronto.

After our week in Rostov, we were able to meet the directors of Sefer, an organization based in Moscow, whose members gather to share their knowledge, as in any academic association. They also distribute Jewish cultural and religious information and Hebrew language instructional materials to smaller and less favorably endowed Jewish communities in the former Soviet Union. Despite its limited financial resources, the accomplishments of Sefer are very impressive. (The organization desperately needs a Judaica library of books and CD-Roms, and we hope to secure help for them.)

With the aid of the International Centre for the University Teaching of Jewish Civilization in Jerusalem and of the Joint Distribution Committee, they organize regional conferences for students and faculty and major conclave conferences in Moscow. In the few years of Sefer's existence, the directors have managed to host international conferences that bring together Israeli, Russian and North American Jewish scholars. Currently Sefer is planning an exciting Summer School for students and faculty for 1997.

There was mutual agreement that York scholars could play a vital role in fostering the development of Jewish studies all over the former Soviet Union. We are, of course, prepared to help in any way we can and look forward to a return visit to Russia in the near future.

Rostov's Jewish roots go back to 17th century

By OLEG BUDNITSKI

It is doubtful that many readers of The Canadian Jewish News know much about the Jewish community of Rostov-on-Don. In fact, the name of the city is more likely to be associated with the Don Cossacks than with Jews. That's why I shall start with a brief historical overview of our community.

Prior to the 1917 revolution, Rostov was one of the largest Jewish communities outside the Pale of Settlement, except, of course, for the more populous and influential Moscow and St. Petersburg communities.

How and when did Jews appear on the banks of the Don River? According to some sources, they first came to the region in the 17th century, probably together with the Ukrainian Cossacks. But the growth of the Jewish population of Rostov (which was founded in 1749) became noticeable only in the second half of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th century.

Standing: Prof. Oleg Budnitzki. Seated from right: Anne Zelechow, Prof. Bernie Zelechow, Eugene Budnitzki, who served as translator, and an unidentified student.

Most Jews were craftsmen and tradesmen, retired soldiers, professionals. My own family offers a good example. My first known ancestor on my father's side was a retired soldier who had been caught by draftee catchers (khappers) in Belarus, served in the Caucasus and after his retirement from service, was granted the right to live outside the Pale. On my mother's side, the first known ancestor is my great-grandmother, a student of Warsaw University, who was evacuated to Rostov together with the university in 1915 because of World War I.

At the beginning of the 20th century, Jews comprised seven percent of the total population of 200,000, being the second largest religious group after Christians. But the influence of the Jewish community far exceeded its percentage in the population. Jews were the owners or executives of many financial and industrial establishments. There were also quite a number of Jews among the leaders of almost all the opposition and revolutionary parties. There were three synagogues in the city, several small prayer houses, a Jewish library and a Jewish bookstore. The library and bookstore were headed by Vladimir Dubnov the brother of the well-known historian, Shimon Dubnov.

A number of Jewish organizations were active in the city at the turn of the century, including the Poalei-Zion party. When Rostov Jews faced violent pogroms during the 1905 revolution, Jewish self-defence units were organized and met the pogromchiks with gunfire.

The revolution of 1917 split Rostov Jewry, as it did Jews elsewhere in Russia. Many emigrated; others enlisted in the service of the new Soviet state. The situation was worst for those who tried to preserve their Jewishness. The "internationalist" Soviet power aimed at uprooting all "religious remnants." Out of three synagogues, only one, the so-called Soldiers' Synagogue, remained open. (Prof. Martin Lockshin of York University lectured there this past May.) The magnificent building of the Choral Synagogue was given to a venereal disease clinic, and only one wall was left of the third. A prayer house in Rostov's Nakhichevan district became a dormitory for gypsies.

10,000 Jews in Rostov

In August 1942, the city was surrendered to the Nazis without any resistance, and thousands of Jews who hadn't had time to flee were taken to Zmyovskaya Balka near Rostov and shot. Among the victims were my great-grandfather and great-grandmother. My great-grandfather, a merchant who had visited Germany before World War I, thought the "stories" about Nazi brutality were Bolshevik propaganda. But, of course, it was not so.

It is typical that the inscription on the monument erected at the site of the massacre said that it was built in memory of the "Soviet citizens who perished at the hands of the Nazi occupiers." The authorities did not mention that those citizens were Jews. The term Holocaust still doesn't mean much to the majority of Russians.

Nowadays about 10,000 people out of Rostov's population of a million are Jewish. Since the end of the 1980s, a process of self-identification (known as the "national revival") has been underway. More and more people attend the synagogue, an act for which previously a person could lose his or her job, and which is not easy even now, since people work and go to school on Saturday. There is a school at the synagogue, and even a yeshivah.

At the end of the 1980s, the Rostov Association for The Advancement of Jewish Culture was formed, in response to people's desire to know more about the traditions and history of their nation. The city authorities gave the association a basement for a meeting place. There people could meet, listen to lectures on the history and culture of the Jewish people, study Hebrew and borrow books — mostly from the Alya Library series which is sent from Israel.

Although there are now possibilities for national revival which did not exist under the Communist regime, these are accompanied by open anti-Semitic propaganda, which was not allowed by the Communist authorities. For example, extremist Cossack organizations from time to time demand that the Jews should be expelled from the Don Region because of their "historical sins." Elections in Russia are now accompanied inevitably by anti-Semitic sloganeering and by graffiti scrawled on the posters of "suspicious" candidates. Freedom has a price!

The academic research and teaching of Jewish studies at Rostov universities began in the early 1990s because of a few enthusiasts at Rostov State Pedagogical University and Rostov State University. We face special difficulties, because no one ever educated specialists in this field. It was unthinkable in the Communist era. Until now, Jewish studies has not been included in the list of approved subjects and it is not regularly financed. But we have found a temporary, although difficult, solution. Professors of my department (the History Department at Rostov State Pedagogical University) who are interested in the history of the Jewish people have begun to include material on Jewish history in general history courses. For those students who want to deepen their knowledge, we have special courses and seminars. Undergraduates and graduate students of my department have already written several papers and dissertations on Jewish history.

Among the professors and students interested in Jewish studies, there are both Jews and non-Jews. In the last four or five years, we have published several works on Jewish history in Russia and in Israel, both in Russian and in English; and we participated in a number of Russian and international conferences.

Much has been accomplished, especially considering our starting point. I doubt that we could have done anything without the serious support of international Jewish organizations and academic institutions abroad. An important role has been played by the International Centre for University Teaching of Jewish Civilization in Jerusalem, chaired by Prof. Nehemia Levtzion, which has held seminars for researchers and lecturers from Russia. The Joint Distribution Committee has helped to fund these. A new and hopefully mutually beneficial step towards developing international contacts is the scholars and lecturers exchange agreement with the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University. As far as I know, this is the very first agreement in the sphere of Jewish studies between a Russian state university and a Western university.

One of the remarkable aspects of the York-Rostov agreement is the short time in which we managed to establish the joint venture. In February at a conference in Moscow, I discussed the possibility of such an agreement with Michael Brown, director of the Centre for Jewish Studies. In May, with the cooperation of The Canadian International Development Agency and the Association of Colleges and Universities in Canada, I already had the pleasure of hosting professors Bernard Zelechow and Martin Lockshin in Rostov!

Could I (or any other professor at Rostov) ever have imagined that we would listen to lectures on biblical memory or the relationship of Jews and Christians in medieval Europe within the same walls where studying the history of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and scientific communism used to be compulsory? The exciting and challenging lectures of York's professaors made a profound impression on our students and professors, and we are looking forward to more visits in the future.

The beginnings of our cooperative enterprise were a success. I hope that in the future we should go from strength to strength.

די ימים נוראים אין די ראָל פון חזנות

פון דר. פרעד וויינבערג

ראש השנה און יום כּפּור האָבן אַ מאָגעטישע קראָפט צוצוציען אין שול אַריין אפילו נישט-רעליגיעז געשטימטע ייִדן. אין טאַראָנטאָ געפינען זיך סעקולאַרע און אַגנאָסטישע ייִדן, וואָס אַראָנזשירן מנינים ספעציעל פאַר די דריי טעג.

ווער פון אונדז פילט נישט די בענקשאַפט פון קינדער-יאָרן, וועלן דער חזן הויבט אָן מיט די ערשטע טענער פון כָּל נדרי. די כָּל נדרי מעלאָדיע איז זיכער אַ הויכפונקט פון אַלע ימים נוראים תפילות און פֿאַרשאַפט אַן אויסוויינענדיקן געפיל. די ספּעציעלע מע-לאָדיע האָט אזוי פאַר־כישופט די מחזיקאַלישע וועלט, אז מען גע-פּינט כָּל נדרי אויסגעטיטשט פאַר אַרקעסטער און פאַר פיל אפּסטרומענטן. עס זיינען דאָ פֿאַרשידענע הערות און טעאָריעס וועגן דעם מקור און אָפּשטאַמונג — ווער און ווען האָט פאַרפאַסט די כָּל נדרי תפילה.

אין די ערשטע יאָרן פון די רעפֿאָרמער האָט ראַבי אברהם גייגער געפֿרידיקט אַנשטאָט כָּל נדרי, „כָּל פִּשְׁעֵי ופִשְׁעֵי כָּל עַמְּךָ מחוק". דאָס וואָרט נדרים אין זיין תפילה איז נישט דערמאָנט געווארן.

מען דערציילט וועגן ר׳ נחמן בראַצלאַווער, אז ער האָט אַמאָל געזאָגט צו זיינע תלמידים: „וי אזוי דאָוועט איר צו גאָט? קען מען דינען גאָט בלויז מיט וועריטער? קומט, וועל איך אייך ווייזן אַ נייעס וועג צו גאָט, נישט דורך וועריטער, נאָר דורך געזאַנג".

אַ הויפּט-טייל פון ראש השנה דאָוונען איז צו הערן שופר בלאָזן. דער רמב״ם טיטשט אויס, אַז די ראָל פון שופר איז אַפּ-וועגדן יעדן פון זיינע זינדיקע וועגן און זיך אומקערן צו תשובה — אריינצוטראַכטן זיך אין זיין נשמה און פאַריכטן זיינע לעבנס-וועגן.

דער חזן בייט דעם נוסח התפילה לויט דעם פרוש המלות — דעם טייטש פון די וועריטער. טיילמאָל מיט שטילערע מתיקות׳די-קע ניגונים, טיילמאָל מיט אַ דינעם הויכן פאַלסעטאָ, און טיילמאָל מיט אַ שטאַרקן בקול רם אויסלאָז, וואָס רופט אַרויס בייַ די מתפּללים טיפע רעליגיעזע געפילן.

ווען דער חזן בעט זיך פאַר אַלעמען „אַל תשליכנו לעת זקנה", נישט צו וועדן פון גאָט פאַרגאַכלעסיקט אויף דער עלטער, באַ-וויזט זיך אפט אַ טרער בייַם צבור. און טיילמאָל נעמט אויס דער חזן בייַם עולם בלויז מיט זיין זאָגן, דאָס הייסט „רעציטאטיוו", אַן מעלאָדיע, אויסדרינגדיק דעם געפיל פון דער תפילה.

ווער קען פאַרגעסן זיין אייגן האַרציק געפיל, ווען דער חזן הויבט אָן „בראש השנה יכתבון", ווער זאָל בליבן לעבן און ווער וועט נישט דערלעבן דאָס קומענדיקע יאָר. דאָס זיינען נאָר ווער-טער, אָבער מיטן חזנ׳ס קרעכץ זיינען די תפילות ממש געווייקט אין טרערן. און לויט דעם אָפּקלאַנג פונעם עולם ראש השנה און יום כּפּור קען מען אָפּמעסטן דעם חזנ׳ס ראָל אַלס שליח ציבור.

Israel looks to the desert

By DAN GOLDBERG
WZPS

According to Jewish Agency figures, more than 700,000 immigrants from the former Soviet Union have arrived in Israel since 1989. While the general problems of such mass immigration have been confronted and largely overcome, long term structural solutions are still being developed. One such proposal follows in the footsteps of Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, who envisioned the development of the desert as the key to overcoming the problems of immigration.

"We need men of the desert who will ... lead us in transforming the wasteland into a blessing, a place in which to work and live. Unless we conquer ... the desert ... we cannot succeed in the tasks of immigration and resettlement."

Over 50 years later, Jewish Agency professionals and government ministries are still nursing Ben-Gurion's notion while deliberating on a potential panacea. With the population of Israel fast approaching five million, the majority living in the central part of the country, the Ministry for Housing and Construction recently issued a proposal for a new development project in the Negev desert called Pitchat Nitzana — the City of Peace.

The Nitzana region lies in the south west Negev, close to Israel's border with Egypt. Despite the establishment of towns such as Dimona, Ashkelon and Arad in the northern Negev and a handful of villages and kibbutzim in the Arava, the Negev desert is one of Israel's last havens of largely undeveloped, natural beauty.

Veteran politician, Lova Eliav, is the modern day Ben-Gurion. An ex-Labor party member, he is among the brave who have followed the vision of reclaiming the desert and making it bloom. In the late '80s, he began building a youth village on the Israeli-Egyptian border, which today accommodates more than 450 students and counsellors, and offers programs on desert ecology, flora and fauna. "The Nitzana youth village," says Eliav, "was the catalyst for Pitchat Nitzana."

The suggested location, 50 kilometres south of Pitchat Shalom, will be linked to Beersheva and the centre of the country by an efficient and effective infrastructure of railway tracks and roads. The proposal intends to develop communication networks not only within Israel, but with neighboring states too. Both Jordan and Egypt lie near a main trade route that will be directed through Pitchat Nitzana. Currently, the youth village joins a main road into Egypt, which will eventually be linked up to Jordan and Gaza.

The notion that this City of Peace could become a bridge between Africa and Eurasia would certainly vindicate the choice of its name and substantially open up trade in the region. Indeed, Pitchat Nitzana (literally the corridor of Nitzana) has — according to historians — acted as a bridge between the continents of Africa and Eurasia in the past. Clearly, the planners have similar intentions for the future.

Bridging continents

While this plan is new, it is not original — some 60,000 Nabateans and Byzantines existed in this area approximately 2,000 years ago (between 200 BCE and 800 CE). Indeed, the ruins of this settlement are expected to attract a tourist industry already thriving from the opening of the youth village. Furthermore, plans to build a 500-room hotel will accommodate tourists interested in the ancient history of the area, the ecosystem of the desert, and act as a gateway to the Sinai and Egypt in general.

Ultimately, the plan is to build a settlement of between 50,000 and 100,000 people. A border terminal will be set up and there is a proposal to develop the area into a free trade zone. The national water carrier already runs to Nitzana and will provide water for personal consumption. Saline water will be used for irrigation purposes, which according to Erez Kapara, acting director of the Negev Region (Department For Rural and Urban Development, Jewish Agency), is already yielding successful tomatoes and other crops.

In the first stage of development, 1,000 houses will be built for a starting population of 3,500, which will also justify the founding of an elementary school. Industry in the area will provide work for 1,200 workers, 600 of whom will be new to the region, and assorted public services will be introduced. The area is expected to attract new immigrants, Israelis looking for a higher quality of life at a lower cost, and army personnel located in the Negev.

A Talmudist from Beijing

Ever since his arrival in Israel two years ago, Ping Zhang, a Beijing University lecturer, now doing a Talmud-related doctorate at Tel Aviv University (TAU), has been struck more by the similarities between Israel and China than the differences. It was these similarities which attracted him to study Talmud.

"Both cultures have tried to build a society based on infallibility," he says in explanation. "The drive for perfectionism is evident both in the halachic observance of laws and also in the moral code of Confucianism. In addition, both traditions place a strong emphasis on learning and scholarship and rely strongly on debate and argumentation."

Zhang was studying for an MA in Oriental literature at Beijing University, when he was informed that he would have to learn a second foreign language. Hebrew was one of the options. Perhaps influenced by the fact that his grandfather had been a Bible-loving Christian, Zhang chose to learn the language of the Bible.

His class, taught by a Jewish American woman, had only eight students and was the first program in Jewish cultural studies established at the university (1985), approximately eight years before the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and Israel. To date, the program has graduated two classes, with three students entering the diplomatic service in the growing area of Chinese-Israeli relations.

Zhang was very enthusiastic about his Hebrew studies, becoming so proficient in the language that he was able to translate two stories by the Israeli writer Shmuel Yosef (Shai) Agnon, a Nobel laureate, from Hebrew into Chinese.

Beijing University decided to send him for a year's study at Jerusalem's Hebrew University, within the framework of a cultural exchange agreement between China and Israel. Once in Israel, he was granted permission from Beijing to stay on and do a PhD at Tel Aviv University. At first it was to be on modern Hebrew literature, but a new translation project persuaded Zhang to choose another topic.

This project was the translation of a section of the Mishnah, Pirkei Avot (The Sayings of the Fathers), from Hebrew to Chinese, which took him three months of morning-to-night work. At the same time, he prepared a commentary that would put this work of Jewish philosophy into context for readers in China.

"As things turned out," says Zhang, "the effort was worthwhile, for it convinced me to devote my thesis to Hebrew writings of the past rather than of the present, as I originally intended." Zhang's dissertation involves a comparative study of the Mishnah and Confucian texts, with special emphasis on the notion of fallibility and infallibility in both traditions.

Ping Zhang, a Beijing University lecturer presently doing a Talmud-related doctorate at Tel Aviv University.

Zhang supports himself by teaching Chinese to Israeli students, who express enormous interest in his country. "The interest is reciprocal," he says, for since the establishment of diplomatic relations between the two nations, there is a growing interest in China about Israel. The increasing popularity of books about Israel, he adds, attests to this.

Zhang is one of nine Chinese students stydying at TAU. "We are extremely busy," he says, "and share a serious attitude toward our studies with Israeli students." However, he points out, the life of a student in China is much easier than that of his Israeli counterpart: "In China," says Zhang, "a student entering university is fed, clothed and housed by the government — with a guaranteed job at the end of the line. I admire the Israeli student's sense of individual responsibility."

Zhang, who lives in student dormitories at TAU, has made many Israeli friends. "Israelis are very friendly, though perhaps more to foreigners than to one another," he comments. "But I suppose the same is true of my own countrymen."

As far as everyday life is concerned, Zhang has become used to eating falafel, hummus and tehinah. "It's not as terrible as I thought in the beginning," he jokes. One aspect of Israeli life that strikes him the most is the large number of religious people. "There are more religious people in Israel than I expected. In China, Confucianism as a practice is almost non-existent. No one can afford the luxury of being able to study the five classics of the Confucian texts."

When asked what he finds the most strange in Israel, Zhang says, "What is surprising is that I don't feel anything strange — the ordinary people are just like the Chinese. My Israeli friends are always ready to help out; as in China, friendship is treated very seriously here." (WZPS)

Children defy disabilities to mark milestone

By BONNIE ROCHMAN
WZPS

Eldad sits, brown knitted kippah pinned to his silky hair as he bobs up and down, chest touching his knees. He stops his davening only when he is called to the Torah.

He stands gazing out at the crowd as he painstakingly pronounces the unmistakable words of the Torah blessings.

Defying the odds, Eldad is one of 10 children with developmental disabilities who celebrated a bar or bat mitzvah last spring in a packed Haifa synagogue.

What began in 1995 as a Conservative pilot program in Israel for 20 students with cerebral palsy and muscular dystrophy has blossomed into a full-fledged project, with official recognition from Israel's Ministry of Education and new funding to expand the project to additional special schools and to children with other disabilities such as Down's syndrome.

Keren says the blessing without any coaching from her teacher and peeks at the audience, giggling and covering her mouth. One girl with glasses and a flowered shirt reaches out a chubby hand to touch the Torah as it is carried around the synagogue, and lays her cheek against the silver breastplate for several seconds. Bracha, a tiny girl wearing a chunky pearl necklace, canvasses the crowd after completing her Torah reading, shaking hands with everyone.

The 10 b'nei mitzvot, students at the Ginagar School in Haifa, are watched by their smiling classmates and their beaming parents.

Nadav, the only one in the school who can't walk, is helped to the Torah by his teacher and 11-year-old sister, who holds him tightly and silently mouths the words to the blessings along with him.

She gives him a hug and, like a doting mother, adjusts his kippah. Nadav's grin is contagious as he polishes off the blessings, prompted by his teacher. Planting a kiss on his cheek, Nadav's mother, looking slightly dazed, wears the same exuberant smile.

"He originally wanted to sit for the brachot," says special education teacher Gary Kamen. "We spent hours convincing him he could stand and hold on."

Preparing the children for bar mitzvah requires learning aids, says Kamen. Since most of the children can't read, they must learn the blessings by heart, which raises the problem of short- and long-term memory.

To compensate, Kamen and teacher Ziva devised a sheet that paired symbols with the different words to the blessings. Sky, for example, was the cue for God, and the children learned to say "Adonai" every time the sky symbol appeared.

"They need a lot of repetition, but they are very highly motivated," says Kamen, who along with Nativ, prepared the group for the religious ceremony in 2½ months.

"It was a very emotional experience working with them. Every time they learn something new, they get so excited and scream and jump. These are kids who thought they would never be bar mitzvahed."

At another group bar mitzvah last year, 10 children with cerebral palsy and muscular dystrophy read, signed, pointed to or made use of a recorded message to express personal blessings penned by themselves. At that ceremony, the teachers decided to call each child to the Torah with the Hebrew word Ya'aleh (come up) instead of the traditional Ya'amod (stand up), since the majority of the group could not stand.

"Yigor didn't fall off the stage, Rafi didn't have a seizure! Vicki's voice output machine worked!" says Susie Dvoskin, one of two teachers who worked to prepare the group.

"One child with a terminal disease even said, 'Thank God for my health,' " recalls Judith Edelman-Green, the project's coordinator.

Enabling children with disabilities to overcome barriers is what motivates Edelman-Green, as she works to expand the program to all parts of the country where there is a Conservative congregation to supply teachers to the program. There are facilities in 13 schools and one hospital at present organizing Jewish education and bar/bat mitzvah training.

By October, Edelman-Green hopes to have 20 teachers training 100 children who otherwise would have been denied the chance to celebrate their religious coming-of-age.

Bedouin woman is a role model

By BARBARA GINGOLD

She flies across the campus, white veil billowing, long black dress lifting incongruously above cluncky, high-heeled shoes. "Amal, Amal!" In every corner of Ben-Gurion University, there's someone clamoring to talk with Amal El-Sana. Arab students in jeans call her to join them for coffee. A Jewish social worker stops to confer about some courses. The president of the university strides by with some colleagues. "What's new, Amal?" he asks.

The answer to his question is Amal herself: a new kind of woman never before seen moving Israel's Bedouin. Proud of her tradition, aware of its shortcomings, and determined to change what needs to be changed — first and foremost, for the Bedouin women of the Negev. Twenty-two years old and headed for law school at Tel Aviv University, Amal El-Sana of Lagiya Village leaves no doubt that if anyone can improve the lot of her people, it is she.

"When I was five," she says, her strong, open face a striking contrast to the white veil, "I already knew I wasn't like other little girls. Instead of sending me to kindergarten — they didn't think it was very important — my family let me take the sheep out to the fields. A great responsibility, usually just for boys. But my father wanted to build my personality, to show people that girls could do something, too."

It was El-Sana's father who bestowed upon her a feminist consciousness along with her name. "When I was born, my parents already had four daughters and a son. They didn't want another girl. The whole family was in tears. And angry: they tried to convince my father to take another wife who would give him sons. He gave me the name 'Amal' — Hope — so that his next children would be boys!"

His next offspring were indeed boys. By the time El-Sana's youngest sibling was born, six brothers had taken their "rightful" place among eight sisters. "At home, I always got the leftovers," Amal asserts darkly. "Whether it was food, clothes, or education, the boys always got theirs first.

"Actually," she concedes, "my father wasn't sorry that he had daughters. He believed that we should all be educated. He not only agreed to send my eldest sister to teachers' college in Beersheva — she was the first Bedouin student there — but drove her to and from school every day. People in our village couldn't understand how Dad could send my sister to school in the city, at a marriageable age and they made his life miserable. 'Your daughter is a prostitute,' they taunted. 'Take her out of school or we'll kill her.'"

No wonder, then, that the El-Sana family tried to keep their younger daughters at home for as long as possible. While her brothers were sent off to good secondary schools in Haifa, Amal was left behind to attend the local Bedouin high school at Tel Sheva, a half hour's ride from Lagiya.

"I was a better student than all my brothers," she says, "but I couldn't get my parents to send me to school in Haifa. Tel Sheva High was dreadful! I knew more than some of the teachers; the guy who was supposed to teach us English had only a high school diploma himself! So I started becoming a 'troublemaker.'

"The teachers were so bad, I was always organizing strikes against them," she explains, relishing the memory. "We ran political demonstrations, demonstrations for better education in our village, for improving the status of women. I didn't stop moving!" By 17, she was a seasoned organizer and a public personality. More than ready to leave her village behind, she entered Ben-Gurion University's School of Social Work — threatening her parents with a hunger strike if they didn't allow her to live in the college dormitories.

Today, with the perspective of a social work student and a bit of distance from her home village, Amal casts an analytic look at the Bedouins of the Negev, a traditional society in the process of radical transformation.

"The past 20 years have been very hard for the Bedouin," she begins. "For many hundreds of years, we were a nomadic community. Then, suddenly, the Israeli government decided that we should live in permanent villages. For similar communities elsewhere in the world, the transition from tribal tents to private homes took centuries. We were forced to make it overnight."

Since the 1970s, almost half the Bedouin in the Negev have been settled by the government in permanent towns and villages with a grim minimum of communal infrastructure. Those who have preferred to maintain their traditional, tent-dwelling lifestyle live in even harsher conditions, denied access to such basic public services as electricity and sewage systems. Both from personal and academic experience, Amal is particularly, painfully aware of the terrible toll this revolution has taken on Bedouin women.

"My grandmother tells me how women used to be the backbone of Bedouin society. When we lived in tents, women didn't just sew them, they also decided when the family would pick them up and move. Women worked the fields, milked the goats, prepared all the food, stitched the clothes, wove the rugs, managed the family economy... Each woman was a whole factory, and the men were there to help her!''

The enforced transition from nomadic life, El-Sana declares, has reversed gender roles, leaving Bedouin women ''unemployed,'' prisoners in their concrete desert homes. While their men go out to work in mainstream Israel, primarily as laborers or self-employed businessmen, wives and daughters cannot do so.

''When we moved into permanent homes, all of women's traditional skills were laid aside, like in a museum. Ninety-nine percent of Bedouin women above the age of 40 are illiterate. Bedouin society nowadays is 'For Men Only.' Women have no self-esteem, no communal feeling. The only thing left for them to do is to have children — and our birthrate shows it!''

While still in high school, El-Sana and some girlfriends took it upon themselves to change the situation. In 1991, they created the Lagiya Women's Committee, offering women courses in health care, home economics, reading and writing, and regular social events to bolster their sense of community as well as their sense of self. A summer ''day camp,'' now in its third year, attracts 14- to 20-year-olds with lectures on women's rights, health, and equality. But the committee, totally run by volunteers from the village, began to flounder a year ago for lack of funds and organizational experience. Amal credits the committee's survival to SHATIL.

''SHATIL found us and gave us all kinds of help. How to register as a non-profit association. How to write proposals and press releases, how to do fundraising, how to work together. Now we meet with the SHATIL coordinator three times a week, at her office or the village. And,'' she adds gleefuly, ''the women of Lagiya have taken over the village social hall, which used to be just for men. The New Israel Fund is even going to find us seed money for our activities.''

In SHATIL's Beersheva office, director Dvorah Oreg says that ''Amal's energy is boundless.'' ''This year alone, she applied to a foundation and got academic scholarships for 10 young women from Lagiya — women who would otherwise be sitting at home, just waiting to get married. For those who won't be going on to study after high school, her Women's Committee set up a project based on women's traditional crafts — not just producing them, but also learning to market them in the village and beyond. Then Amal recruited another Bedouin student at the University to establish a Women's Committee in her own village, drawing on the Lagiya experience. All this on top of her studies, demonstrations, public meetings, publishing weekly segments of a novel in the Arab press ... and in a world where, barely a few years ago, a Bedouin woman was not allowed to leave her own neighborhood, much less visit another tribe!''

Of the 39 organizations served by the SHATIL office in Beersheva, half are Bedouin. ''We asked our client groups,'' Oreg says, ''if they would prefer to meet separately — some training sessions for Arabs, some for Jews. They all refused. There's 'chemistry' between the groups, and it's good for everyone. Men and women work together, Ethiopians and Russians and Bedouin and third-generation Israelis exchange ideas and form coalitions. The Women's Committee of Lagiya thinks up an arts education project for their young children — and they turn for help to a group of Russian immigrants! It's all new. Nobody forces them or their communities to change. It just becomes part of a natural process.''

Helping workers get back on track

By SARAH AVERICK
WZPS

Where can a young man who suffers from low self-esteem and outbreaks of physical violence acquire the self-discipline and skills to work in a conventional business setting? Where can new immigrants from the former Soviet Union who had emotional breakdowns from the stress of the transition find jobs? Where can a young mother debilitated by postpartum depression gain the confidence and vocational training to work outside the home?

Today, 130 men and women with a variety of emotional and psychological problems have found a place at Chazon Fetaya (Fetaya's Vision), a pioneer occupational rehabilitation centre based in Jerusalem.

Founded 20 years ago, the three-branch enterprise was the brainchild of Shaul Fetaya whose own child suffered extended severe depression. In 1975, when the conventional wisdom shared by the medical establishment and the Health Ministry was that mental patients were best left in hospitals, Fedya understood the simple, therapeutic, restorative power of giving someone a job. A decade later, the Health Ministry seized upon the idea and set up a countrywide network of rehabilitation centres modelled on Chazon Fetaya.

Young, middle-aged and elderly, observant and secular, native-born and new olim, men and women from Jerusalem, Bnei Brak and Haifa, as well as several smaller settlements, all work intently and unselfconsciously at the well-equipped work stations.

Some tasks are more sophisticated than others in the factory's departments, which include computers, desktop publishing, bookbinding, dressmaking, carpentry, signmaking, hairdressing and label-production. Workers are paid between four and nine shekels an hour based solely on their work performance.

"On principle, we won't give our employees simply rote tasks," said executive director Simcha Ovadia, Fetaya's daughter. "We train them on sophisticated equipment whenever possible so they can get a job in the free market when they are ready."

Each year, Ovadia estimated, 10 to 15 percent of the workers are mainstreamed into jobs outside Chazon's protected framework and since its establishment, she said, some 2,000 people have passed through the centre's doors.

Take Asher, for example. Chazon supervisor Shmuel Munk recounted, with Asher's permission, that the 22-year-old's struggle with low self-esteem began as early as nursery school, where he was derided for his unusual height and awkwerdness. One of six children, Asher became more and more disruptive, even violent, both at home and in school. He came to Chazon Fetaya four years ago after being hospitalized in his late teens.

Chazon worked at modifying his behavior through a point system, rewarding him for good work habits by increasing his salary based on the number of points he received in his personal workbook.

For the past year, Asher has been working in desktop publishing in an office near his home in a Tel Aviv suburb. By choice, he returns to Chazon twice weekly for enrichment courses on the Macintosh and in computer music.

Chazon's success has led Israel's mental health establishment to reconsider the importance of a steady job. "I have a waiting list with tens of people who've been referred by their doctors," said Ovadia. "Would that we had the funds and the premises, we could touch that many more lives. We live from hand to mouth and put our trust in the Almighty that we will keep going."

New program stresses pluralistic approach to Jewish studies

By GAIL LICHTMAN
WZPS

Diaspora Jewish communities are not the only ones with Jewish education problems. Israel's general (secular) public school system has never been quite sure just how to approach teaching Jewish studies.

Caught between the need to address diverse world views and the traditional halachic approach to Jewish studies, the general public schools opted for limited studies in order to escape the moral and educational conflicts inherent in teaching this subject.

Now, a new program, designed to present a pluralistic and not necessarily halachic approach to traditional Jewish studies, is bringing the enrichment and excitement of Jewish texts and sources to Israeli high school teens in the general public school system.

The program, developed by Elul, a non-profit organization founded in 1989, aims to create a pluralistic educational framework for Jewish studies to encourage dialogue and understanding between religious and secular Jews. It combines the study of traditional Jewish sources with modern Hebrew and Israeli texts, through non-conventional batei midrash (houses of learning).

"For many years, Jewish education in general public high schools consisted of no more than the mandatory three hours a week of basic Bible studies," says Moti Bar-Or, Elul's co-director. "The teachers tended to be very academic or very Orthodox, and not really in touch with the students, and the Ministry of Education didn't seem willing to do much about the problem."

Then, in 1991, the ministry appointed the Shenhar committee to undertake a three-year study of Jewish studies in public education. "This was the first time that Zionist, secular Israel was examining Jewish studies and not leaving it to the Orthodox community," says Bar-Or. "The committee recommended putting forth a revolutionary idea — that the non-Orthodox take responsibility for Jewish education in their own sector."

But this was easier said than done. With no infrastructure and a shortage of qualified teachers, the Ministry of Education turned to Elul to develop a program.

"The reason the ministry turned to us," says Elul co-director Melila Hellner "is because Elul's basic guideline is to empower people to take active responsibility for textual Jewish studies. We were the first outreach centre propounding the idea that people from different backgrounds can invest in textual study together and through passionate engagement with the sources develop a sense of shared destiny deeper than their religious and ideological differences."

"Elul takes an interdisciplinary approach to learning Jewish texts," says Bar-Or. "Our students are exposed to different strata in Jewish literary culture; not just Bible or Mishnah but a variety of Jewish genres. We also examine how the text has been treated by different groups in different times. Our programs are based on the traditional havruta method of study in which two or three people study a text together. This creates powerful and unique relationships. We also believe in giving those studying a feeling of being part of a chain of continuity, which links them with those who studied before them and those who will study after them."

Since the program's inception two years ago, 12 batei midrash have been started in 12 different high schools in the Jerusalem area, with nearly 500 students in grades 9 though 11 participating. Next year, Elul hopes to be able to expand beyond the Jerusalem area.

At the same time, Elul has embarked on a teaching training program designed to help teachers create interactive Jewish study frameworks for their students. Now in its second year, more than 40 teachers from 13 schools are taking part.

The teachers meet seven hours a week to learn how to develop alternative methods of conveying Jewish texts to Israeli youth. The program includes unique meetings between religious and secular teachers to enable them to compare methods of instruction.

In addition, Elul has just started a curriculum development project and has been asked by the Ministry of Education to develop a nation-wide curriculum for Jewish studies.

The Experimental High School in Jerusalem is one of the general public schools which has opted for the beit midrash program. Some 25 students, mainly in grades 9, 10 and 11, have chosen to spend an extra two hours a week in school to study Jewish texts.

"These kids could go home," says Roni Yavin, a history and Jewish studies teacher, one of three teachers (two Orthodox, one secular) conducting the beit midrash at the Experimental School. "The beit midrash is optional. Yet they come here week after week to take part."

The learning is non-frontal. A theme is selected and the group begins with a general introduction to that theme. Sheets are passed out with selected texts relating to the theme, which include both traditional Jewish sources, modern Hebrew literature, psychology,

Israelis becoming aware of need for organ donations

By NAOMI FEINSTEIN KESSLER
WZPS

The metaphor of the honey and the sting is a frequent feature in Jewish life, and hence in the life of the Jewish State.

A recent example of this was the tragic death of 20-year-old American student Alisa Flatow by a suicide bomb in Kfar Darom and the decision of her family to donate her organs. Not only did this decision serve to save the lives of four of the six Israeli recipients of Alisa's organs (two died the day after the transplants), it also rekindled interest in the issue of transplants, and has raised awareness among the Israeli public of the necessity for donating organs.

Nine hundred and forty-two people are presently awaiting organ transplants in Israel and according to Dr. Pierre Singer, a transplant surgeon in Israel's Beilinson Hospital. "Fifty percent of them will die within the year if they don't receive organ donations."

In a survey sponsored by the Israel Ministry of Health in October 1994, it was revealed that over half of Israel's Jewish population mistakenly believes that donating organs for transplant is forbidden by Jewish law. Some believe it is a desecration of the deceased, while others expressed fears that there might be a discrepancy in determining the time of death or even that doctors might be in a hurry to determine the death of one patient in order to transplant the organs into another. These fears are groundless.

The time of death, which by law must be determined by two independent doctors, and, if possible, a rabbi, is fixed at the time the brain ceases to function, not, as commonly thought, when the brain and heart stop functioning. The heart can continue to beat even after death. Some rabbis oppose transplants on these grounds, even though in 1986 the Chief Rabbinate of Israel studied the issue and drew up directives for the authorization of heart transplants at the request of the Ministry of Health.

Changes are also evident within Israel. Although the proportion of organ donors in Israel is still lower than in Europe (9.6 donors per million people in Israel compared to an average of 14.7 in Europe), the number of transplants being performed in Israel's six kidney, three liver and three heart transplant centres, is increasing.

Kidney transplants, for example, have doubled since 1988 with 156 transplants being performed in 1994 alone. Eighty-two of the organs came from accident victims and 74 from living donors. In 1994, 12 liver transplants and seven lung transplants were performed as opposed to 11 liver and one lung transplant in 1992.

The Ministry of Health is in contact with the Eurotransplant Organ Bank which coordinates organ donations and their allocation in European countries. But as Israel does not donate organs to the bank, it is not eligible to receive organs.

Every attempt, however, is being made to improve the situation and to date, individual agreements have been signed with Cyprus (1993) — an accord in which Israel agreed to teach Cypriot surgeons to perform transplants in return for receiving organs — and with France (1995) for liver transplants.

In early 1995, then Israel health minister Dr. Ephraim Sneh presented a proposal to the World Health Organization to establish a regional organization in the Middle Netanyahu honed skills in the U.S.

By SHAWN COHEN
Washington Jewish Week

Long before entering Israeli politics, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had already honed his skills of persuasion while attending school in the United States. According to people who knew him then, Netanyahu the student demonstrated many of the qualities for which he is known today: he was a workaholic and he was focused, self-assured and well-spoken.

Then a nonpartisan advocate for Israel, Netanyahu, the son of a Cornell University professor, primarily focused on school and seems to have left little time for a social life.

As a first semester freshman at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) in 1972, Netanyahu, then 23 and going by the name Ben Netay, was looking to take a fast track through college and refused to have a freshman advisor.

Since he wanted to pursue not only introductory courses, but also sophomore, junior and senior level classes, he sought out someone other than an advisor to help structure a seemingly impossible workload. Instead of taking the traditional three or four classes, Netanyahu wanted to take six in his first term.

"He was the only student I knew in 25 years that blew beyond the freshman advisory system right away," marvelled Prof. Leon Groisser, then executive officer of the Department of Architecture, who became Netanyahu's advisor.

"He was also the only student ever to convince me to let him start with six classes. He made it clear that he didn't have four years to get an undergraduate degree."

Netanyahu completed eight years of work in less than four years at MIT, earning a bachelor's degree in architecture and a master's in business at the Sloan School of Management. He was working toward a PhD in political science when he abruptly returned to Israel following the death of his brother Jonathan, who was killed leading the Israeli commandos liberating the hijack victims at Entebbe in 1976.

"This was clearly a man with no time on his hands," said David Lampe, a student at the time and now director of communications for MIT's Alfred P. Sloan School of Management. "He was extremely ambitious. Most people don't remember him because he didn't take time to stop and build personal relationships."

In the mid-1960s, the Israeli-born Netanyahu attended Cheltenham High School in Wyncote, Pa., an upper middle-class school with a high concentration of Jewish students. Dr. Marc Fisher, a schoolmate of Netanyahu's and now a resident of Gaithersberg, Md., described him as a "serious person, definitely not a normal, immature, partying high school kid."

Fisher, who was in the school chess club with Netanyahu (who also played soccer and was in the science club), remembers the future leader as not very sociable.

"He had an intense look on his face all the time," Fisher recalled.

After high school, Netanyahu served five years in an elite Israeli commando unit, earning the rank of captain before returning to the States for college. He enrolled in MIT's School of Architecture, Groisser said, because Israel needed more housing. He earned good grades through an exceptional work ethic.

"He was not a genius," said Groisser. "He was making it by working much harder than anyone else, having absolutely clear goals and working towards them. He organized his time extremely efficiently."

When the Yom Kippur War broke out in October 1973, Netanyahu left the school for several weeks to fight for Israel. Groisser recalled that when he first met Netanyahu, the new student warned him that he would take the first plane to Israel should his service be required.

Netanyahu spent his January break at MIT catching up on course work, but while maintaining the workload, he also found time to engage in pro-Israel politics.

As head of the Israeli Students Association in Cambridge, he spoke in support of the Jewish state and strong U.S.-Israel ties.

Netanyahu became friends with, among others, Alan Dershowitz, a young Harvard law professor with a strong Jewish education who was himself head of a faculty support group for Israel.

The two met in 1973 at a city-wide celebration for Israel's 25th anniversary at which both were featured speakers.

"I had always thought that I was the fastest talker in the world," said Dershowitz. "But no – he was the fastest talker. He was a very take-charge, no-nonsense guy.

"I admired him enormously," added Dershowitz. "We were allies in the same cause. And even in those days, he was an effective advocate for Israel."

Interestingly, Dershowitz said, "At the time, I never got a sense of his political leanings. He was a defender of Israel, period."

In 1973, "Netanyahu was standing up very strongly for the Labor party government. Like me, he felt that we needed to present a united front for Israel," Dershowitz said.

The two men have remained friends. Netanyahu recently presented Dershowitz and eight others with the Jerusalem 3000 Award for commitment to the state of Israel and the Jewish people.

At MIT, Netanyahu earned his bachelor's in architecture after 2½ years and then entered the Sloan School of Management.

"At some point along the line," Groisser said, "he figured that, even though he was doing very well in architecture, he really didn't have extraordinary talent in this area. That's why I think he entered the Sloan School."

Netanyahu is said to have told MIT professors that he hoped to use his combined studies in management and architecture to alleviate Israel's housing shortage.

According to Lampe, Netanyahu "zipped through" the Sloan School, pursuing studies as relentlessly as he had as an undergraduate.

Completing a master's degree in May 1976, he co-authored a thesis about computerization in the newspaper industry. Even then, he demonstrated savvy for politics and the media and forecast a future development.

"Computerization may enhance the political power of newspapers," Netanyahu wrote in the dissertation, "by providing them with databanks and the ability to compile and disseminate pertinent information on issues or people at a very rapid rate."

On the way to a doctorate in political science, Netanyahu abruptly left MIT in July 1976 after his brother Jonathan's death.

Fifteen years later, Groisser saw his former student again when Netanyahu, as Israeli ambassador to the United Nations, addressed a Jewish group in Boston. The Israeli, Groisser said, spoke about the difficulties of achieving real peace with the Arabs.

"He did superbly and got a standing ovation," Groisser recalled. "The fact that I did not agree with anything he said is only a higher compliment to how he did," Groisser half-joked.

"I am not surprised that he became prime minister of Israel," Groisser said in retrospect. "What I saw then at MIT is exactly what everybody is seeing now.

"It was clear he had the drive and ambition and ability and focus to do anything he wanted. He sets up a goal and he meets it. To his credit, he was also willing to re-evaluate and reformulate those goals along the way."

world literature and general philosophy. The students divide up into their havruta groups to explore the different texts then return to the group to discuss each group's insights and ideas.

"This method of learning is very appropriate for our school, which is based on independent learning" says Gila Bar-Or, a literature teacher who initiated the idea of the beit midrash at the Experimental School.

"Elul gives us the general framework but we are free to build our own program in accordance with our needs and students' levels. Most of our students have had no previous experience with Jewish texts outside of school, so this is the first time they have delved into Jewish learning," she says.

Shlomo Guzman, with his mop of tousled blond curls, is hardly your typical yeshivah student, but he was no less earnest as he pored over the texts at the Experimental School's beit midrash. This is the 16-year-old's second year in the program. "I come because this interests me and I feel I'm getting a different sort of knowledge from the Jewish texts."

For Elul, the high school batei midrash program is another successful link in its outreach efforts, which also include programs for new immigrants and Bezalel Art Academy students, as well as the general public.

Elul believes that by making the insights of Jewish learning available to the mainstream of Israeli society, it will be creating a common language for dialog and understanding between all Jews in Israel.

Transplant centre begun

East for cooperation in organ transplants.

In 1993, a national organs transplant centre was established with the assistant of the Eurotransplant Organ Bank, in order to facilitate donation procedure. Located in Beilinson Hospital in Petach Tikva, the centre serves all the country's hospitals and works in cooperation with ADI, a voluntary donors organization established in 1978 by the parents of Adi, a young man who underwent a belated transplant and did not survive.

According to Ruthie Zucker Weiss, director of ADI, "At present, some 80,000 potential donors are registered with ADI, which is engaged in educational activities to encourage people to agree to donate organs and to carry donor's cards." The increase in members, she claims, is due to successful transplants, positive publicity and the organizational work of the National Organ Transplant Centre.

Another factor which has undoubtedly contributed to the willingness of the Israeli public to donate organs is the decision of the Flatow family, an Orthodox family living in the United States, to donate the organs of their daughter for transplant in Israel. Rather than seeing this as an act of desecration, they felt, as her sister Gail said, that it would enable Alisa to live on.

The general willingness to donate organs has also increased among the Orthodox population. This is largely due to the Chief Rabbinate's ruling that organ transplantation is permissible under Jewish law and the support the ruling received from rabbis such as Rabbi Shlomo Zalman Auerback, one of the foremost haredi halachic arbiters. Some Orthodox, however, stipulate that they will only donate to Jews.

One must not forget, of course, that transplants give life to others. "The best thing families can do is to donate organs," said Yitzhak Sa'ada whose brother Herzl underwent a liver transplant one year after Yitzhak himself underwent the same surgery. "This saves the lives of people fighting for every breath and every moment of life."

According to Yakov Salinas, who received Alisa Flatow's heart after a year-long wait, "usually recipients are unaware of the identity of the donor and have no contact with the family. In my case, I knew exactly where my heart came from and under what circumstances. I even met with Alisa's sister, Gail, in Israel. On the one hand I feel a strong bond with the family, while on the other, I am trying to re-establish my own life. I have the deepest respect for Alisa's family. They saved my life."

Volunteerism thriving in Israel

By GAIL LICHTMAN
WZPS

With the limitations of the welfare state a hot topic of debate in both the United States and Europe, there have been increasing calls for voluntary organizations to take up where government leaves off.

In 1981, Israel, which has an outstanding tradition of volunteerism, set up a mandatory program for volunteerism in Israel's high schools. Beginning with 33 schools, the Personal Commitment Program has grown to include more than 250 schools nationwide, including both secular and religious schools.

The Israel Voluntary Services Organization lists some 250 voluntary organizations operating in the country, with more than 50,000 Israelis (out of a population of five million), or about 25 percent of those over the age of 16, engaged in some form of volunteerism.

These organizations run the gamut from the AIDS Task Force to Zahavi, an organization aimed at helping large families; from immigrant absorption, child welfare, senior citizens, health and the disabled, to soldiers' welfare, quality of life and security.

"Everywhere the government is not operating, we do. We fill the gap," says Batya Warshitz, head of the Council for Social Services and Volunteerism, the umbrella body for voluntary organizations in Jerusalem.

The goal of the one-year program is to strengthen the link between youth and the community by making participants in the program aware of the needs of the community and their responsibility to it. Once a high school decides to be part of the program, it becomes a requirement of the school.

Most schools choose to implement the program in Grade 10. "This is because the students are generally mature enough to cope with volunteering," says Ruth Itzhar, director of the Ministry of Education's Department for Community Schools which runs the program.

"Since they still have two more years of studies, it is hoped they will continue their volunteerism on their own. But there is no doubt the students need guidance so as not to get lost or be overwhelmed in adjusting to the tasks," she says.

For this reason, the ministry provides special training for program coordinators and supplies a wealth of workbooks and other materials, including videos, simulation games and role playing, to help the students cope with their volunteering.

Not unexpectedly, in every school, there are some parents who feel that the program takes away time from studies. "We explain to them that the program attains a number of goals beyond just volunteering," says Itzhar.

"The personal goals achieved are in some respects even more important for teenagers who are at a stage in life when they are searching for identity. The program exposes them to a side of life they do not find in school and they learn about themselves and their ability to meet personal challenges and take responsibility," she says.

"Personal responsibility is a very important part of the program," says Nili Eisen, program coordinator at the Leyada School in Jerusalem. "Our teens enjoy being treated like adults and having the responsibilities of adults. They know that once they have made the commitment, they must come every time, even if it's raining or they have a big test the next day. Volunteering has elements of real life. It's like going out to find work for the first time. The students have to present themselves and be interviewed. Not everyone is suited to every task."

Leyada chose to implement the program in Grade 9. The majority of students work with the elderly and a good number work with the handicapped or with disadvantaged children. Those who have difficulty handling emotional stress can do volunteer work in, say, the botanical gardens or one of the country's hospitals.

"The nice thing about this program is that the students don't just give, they also receive," says Eisen. "Sometimes I don't know who gains more, the students or those they are helping."

Eisen cites the case of two girls who volunteered to help an elderly woman, a poet and writer. "She taught them so much about language and enriched their lives with new and exciting ideas and concepts."

As in real life, some of what the students encounter is heartbreaking. One boy discovered his charge, a 5-year-old, was being beaten by his father. "He was in shock," Eisen recalls. "He didn't know what to do."

Some of those working with the elderly have to face debilitating illness and death. Ela Ayalon started helping an elderly man in his 80s. Shortly after she began her weekly home visits, he became very ill and had to be hospitalized.

"I began visiting him in hospital. He was quite sick. In the beginning, it was very difficult to see him like that, to see such difficult things. I didn't feel good. But later, I realized how important it was to visit him and I began to feel better. I know I am doing something important for him," she says.

Bread for Katzenelleboigen

By DAVID SHENTOW

This story tells the eyewitness account of David Shentow, Auschwitz tattoo 725-85.

It was not widely known that thousands of Jews were sent out of Auschwitz to clean up the Warsaw Ghetto in the aftermath of the uprising. I was sent in the first transport and arrived in the first week of September 1943, four months after the ghetto's destruction. That's when I stumbled upon a group of emaciated survivors, still hiding in the ruins.

Our transfer from Auschwitz started with a dreaded selection. We knew that no one ever came back from a selection. We hugged each other goodbye. We were then marched silently towards the ominous building with the big chimney. It was a magic moment when we all realized that the head of the column had passed the fateful turn. I let out a deep sigh and heard a muffled echo as others did the same. It was miraculous even for those who didn't believe in miracles.

Another shock came at the sight of regular passenger trains, with normal windows. Then to our delight, we each received a loaf of bread and a jar of jam, before boarding those trains. We didn't know that this would be our only food for the next few days. Although, considering that we were famished, and euphoric at leaving Auschwitz, I doubt it would have made a difference. We had a feast. We had reason to celebrate, for us, the unimaginable was taking place.

Our train dawdled along. The trip was extended by interminable siding diversions to allow German military trains to pass on their way to the Russian front. We were crammed like sardines, with no room to move or sleep, in compartments meant for six. Whether we were sitting or standing, the only rest was by fitful dozing. Yet, to the thousands of fellow Jews who had been brutalized and pushed beyond endurance at Auschwitz, the three day ride was a welcomed reprieve.

A rumor circulated that we were heading for Warsaw. We were not taken by surprise when we arrived there one morning, before daybreak. It was a hungry, cold and anxious crowd that clambered down the siding. We had had no food for days and our striped rags afforded little protection against the stinging autumn wind that already promised a harsh Polish winter. Fate was merciless: cold, hunger, fatigue and biting lice would be our constant companions. Six weeks later, a typhus epidemic would ravage the camp. During those days, I felt like a zombie in a daze, my recollections are merely glimpses of a nightmare.

From the train station, we were marched directly through the massive arched ghetto entrance and ordered to pile up heavy bricks with our bare hands. We were lost in a sprawling desolation of blackened rubble that stretched across the ghetto as far as the eyes could see. Here and there, a maze of ruins rose above the rest. Those Polish bricks were about three times the size and weight of normal ones. I could never carry more than one at a time.

I had worked only a few moments when, suddenly, I had the sensation of falling. In a flash, I thought my turn had come, as it had for others who fell, never to get up. Yet finding myself still standing, I slowly got hold of my senses. It had been an uncanny illusion caused by a trap door opening and heaving the grounds at my feet.

The dust was still settling when a ghastly scarecrow figure emerged. I was accustomed to the sight of death, but this was like an apparition from a grave. I couldn't quite focus my eyes or my mind. We stood bewildered, staring at each other, to decipher each other's face, to grasp the meaning of each other's presence. It was a moment of supreme puzzlement. I was still trying to take in the scene when his gurgling voice cleared its throat passages.

"Bist a Yid? — Are you a Jew?"

I answered in Yiddish, prolonging the O somewhat to give it the unmistakable Polish-Yiddish accent.

"Yo — yes."

He continued in Yiddish, in an eager, hopeful tone.

"Is the war over?"

I was dumbfounded. It was sad to have to tell him the truth:

"No, the war is still on, there are German guards all around the ghetto walls."

Puzzled, he asked:

"So what are you doing here?"

What was I doing here? I needed a moment to pierce through the shroud of mystery that surrounded that simple question. Let me see, what am I doing here? Where do I start? I heard myself say:

"I'm here because I'm a Belgian Jew."

I hesitated. That didn't make sense. Other words came to my lips: "We are Belgian, French and Dutch Jews, sent from Auschwitz to turn the ghetto into a park."

On the train someone heard from a guard that we had been specially selected because supposedly, we couldn't speak Polish and would not be able to communicate with Polish workers. They had not reckoned that most Belgian and French Jews were likely to have had Polish speaking parents and could get by quite well in Polish.

[Cont'd. on page B 58]

'I'm a Belgian Jew'

[Cont'd. from page B 57]

He continued in his throaty voice:

"So, where are the Russians?"

The question startled me. Maybe he knew something I didn't. Maybe I missed some vital world events. I was curious, and bounced the question back to him:

"Where are the Russians?"

It turned out that weeks earlier they heard artillery and explosions and had been hoping the Russians were coming. I had to disappoint him again.

"No. As far as I know, the Russians are far away."

In sheer desperation, he pleaded: Host a shtickel broit? — Have you any bread?"

Bread meant life. We were now past trying to sort out each other. What could I do? I could only tell him about our own dismal situation, that we had had no food for three days. What else was there to say?

He responded calmly:

"Nu, vos zol men tien? — What is to be done?"

He then motioned me to follow him. I glanced around fearfully, uncertain what to do, then nerved myself and trudged down the steps behind him. Walking along gloomy shadows of still walls, he introduced himself.

"Ich heis Katzenelleboigen — I am Katzenelleboigen."

A cold underground space opened before me. There were 10 to 12 ghostly figures, some standing, some seated on chairs and on a bench by the wall and others lay on the floor. Despite the cold, one man stood bare from the waist up. A small candle flickered on a wooden table. In a corner, I spotted some bottles with sand or something in the bottom, and presumed they were molotov cocktails. The stench was unbearable even for me. Katzenelleboigen introduced me:

"Dos iz an andern Yid — This is another Jew."

I suppose it must have been strange for them to see me in striped rags as it was for me to see Jews not wearing them. It was obvious that they were all glad to see me. Those on the floor simply nodded my way, while others came over, taking turn to greet me with the casual Yiddish salutation:

"Vos macht a Yid? — How is the Jew doing?"

From the few words we exchanged, I pieced together a bit of their story. They joined "die aufstandt — the revolt," when they saw Jews rounded up by the thousands every day. Following the destruction of the ghetto, they managed to survive by trading their gold teeth and clothing, such as winter coats, for bread, with Polish workers who came daily to work. By the time I met them, they had already run out of things to trade and had had nothing to eat for weeks.

They were even skinnier than I was. It was obvious that their days were numbered and that without help, they were condemned to starve in silence. Still, I admired them. Could it be that I also envied their underground freedom? I don't know, but I experienced a sense of compassion I had not felt for a long time. I wanted to give them back the breath of life. I promised Katzenelleboigen to bring whatever food I could find. Waving goodbye, I scrambled back up the stairs, driven, muttering to myself. I thrust my head above ground, looking out furtively for guards. We were lucky that they rarely ventured in the ruins.

Hour after hour, I collected cold bricks with mortar still clinging to them. We each had to pile a shoulder high mound by the end of the shift. These would then be carried away by the Polish workers. I recovered my bearings during those interminable hours, punctuated by hunger pangs. We were all in the grips of starvation and exhaustion, barely one step from the grave. It dawned on me that my feelings of generosity were naive and meaningless, how was I to help a whole group when I couldn't even help myself?

Only wretched misery awaited us at camp, at the end of that first grueling day. There was no food, no washing facilities, nor barracks to protect us from the cold. I eagerly talked to others, seeking help for those abandoned Jews. Nobody was interested, not even our group leader. What could I expect? Our own misery and helplessness stared us in the face. We slept huddled together, on the ground, fending off the lice with scratching bouts. Hunger pains lingered through the night. I didn't think anything could be worse until I was crazed by thirst on our death march to Dachau, in the stifling heat of the following August. Thirst can make you go raving mad.

Nothing happened in the suc-

'Only wretched misery awaited us at camp'

ceeding days to relieve the hunger or raise our spirits. It was dismal. What kept me going was hope, and the vague notion that they would have to feed us soon, if they wanted us to keep on picking up bricks. At least Katzenelleboigen was a free man underground while I was reduced to slavery. He came up to plead every morning:

"A shtikel broit? — Any bread?"

He would scrutinize my shaking head. I didn't have the luxury to feel any pity. I only hoped that he believed me. He always used the same farewell before vanishing underground:

"Nu, vos zol men tien? — What is to be done?"

I wondered how such a frail figure could move that iron trap door.

We crossed path with the night shift, on our way back to camp, at the end of the fourth day. Gleaming eyes and eager head movements thrown our way signalled that there was food. We could barely manage to drag our feet over the rubble. At camp, we made a beeline for rows of tables laden with half loaves of bread. Each man was to grab the next portion in front of him. We advanced quickly, yet not quickly enough.

At one point, I fixed my eyes and sized up my portion in the distance and scrutinized the others to see if there was a bigger one to snatch. Ten, nine, eight ... Every cell in my body tensed. Three, two, my turn! ... I yanked my half loaf, and jostled forward to a free spot on the ground. Ceremoniously, I placed my striped cap on some bricks, making like a plate and placed the bread in the centre. I tore off pieces with my mortar encrusted hands, and wolfed down delicious mouthfulls of the soft bread. It was divine. I always devoured my portions right away however much I invariably regretted it the next morning.

This time it was different, I couldn't finish it. Maybe my stomach had shrunk to nothing or maybe a half loaf was too much to be eaten at once. For lack of pockets, I contrived to hide a big piece in my right pant leg, taking the risk that it might be stolen at night. I had to keep holding it with my wrist and to push it up from time to time, all the while hoping not to attract attention. As an added precaution, in case it should fall, I tied my pant leg snugly with a string around the ankle.

Before daybreak, I felt a hand grazing my back, no doubt, someone looking for corpses, to search for hidden morsels of bread. I felt more spirited at roll call that morning. The sun shone on my face and caressed the forsaken grounds. It warmed me up. It lulled me to daydream ... Maybe, one day, this nightmare will pass. I could feel the bread by my hip.

I waited eagerly for Katzenelleboigen all morning. I waited and waited until I couldn't take it any longer. I went over to the trap door and tapped it a few times, calling out his name. The knock resounded hollow and loud, but there was no answer. I had someone help me lift the trap door, and went alone, down the steps, into the darkness below. The other didn't want to follow.

When my eyes got used to the darkness, I saw three corpses seated erect on the bench by the wall. Others lay scattered on the floor. Katzenelleboigen was seated at the table, his back towards me, holding his head in his hands, with his elbow resting on the table. I called out his name, and moved to tap his shoulder.

"Katzenelleboigen"

He didn't move. I whispered again:

"Katzenelleboigen"

Tapping lightly on his shoulder, I bent over to whisper in his ear:

"Katzenelleboigen."

His body twisted sideways, as if I had pushed him and his head crashed on the table with a bang. He was stone dead. I could see his eyes bulging out of their sockets, glaring at me menacingly. It was a dreadful sight. I scrambled out of that ghastly place as fast as I could. I left the corpses in the freedom of their tomb, to carry their secret with them and, with the passage of time, to turn into remembered heroes.

AFTER TWO THOUSAND YEARS WE ARE LOVERS AGAIN

How do I speak of love shrouded in mists of Europe's hate?
How do I play the Shulamite - a foundling from alien lands?
How do I breathe in myrrh and frankincense when my spices are rosemary and thyme?
Even your moon is different. Pale apricot, not Halloween's orange.
And your smile, enigmatic, tilted like a pensive head.

My art is not
Bezalel's wisdom of the heart.
My fruit not passion fruit
but apple and plum.
The people I know dispute Plato and aesthetics.

Yet I recognized you.

And you knew me at once.

After two thousand years we are lovers again.

Jerusalem in Blue

When I climbed after midnight through the window of my hotel unto the flat roof, right into the Jerusalem night, and the smell of the stones in the fragrant air hit my nostrils -
I suddenly felt that I was in Jerusalem again.

The moon shines differently here in that unique lucid blue that only Jerusalem has.
The taste of the wind on my lips felt like the taste of my childhood and the cool glittering of stars, was the same one that my ancient forefathers saw.

On that night I sat on the flat roof and the quietness was filled with ancient voices, with ancient echoes
that could not be heard.

these were the same kind of voices that the lucky ones could hear, perhaps, in their dreams.

Before dawn I felt again that special translucent light blue that was here before sunrise, that light blue that wrapped my all being with the sweetest beauty of the world.

In my youth I used to walk with my troop of girls that I guided in the youth movement, to Sanhedria in Jerusalem. It was always before sunrise.
We used to sit on the rocks near the Sanhedrin's burial caves and not to utter a word
before sunrise.

When we were sitting so quietly
Looking into the caves within our hearts, the blue light was embracing us on those wonderful mornings of summer.

How lucky I was that on that night and that dawn
I became one
with my ancestors,
I became one
with Jerusalem.

Arab League pressures Israel

By Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM — Arab foreign ministers meeting in Cairo warned Israel on Sunday that they will freeze ties if there is no progress in the peace process.

The Arab League meeting called on Qatar, Oman, Tunisia and Morocco to re-evaluate their relations with Israel, according to a Channel 1 report Sunday night.

"These are independent countries capable of evaluating their national interests very well. External pressure does not serve the interests of the peace process. It has precisely the opposite effect," said Dore Gold, Benjamin Netanyahu's foreign policy adviser, in response.

Ministers at the two-day Arab League meeting repeatedly warned that a collapse in the peace process is imminent.

"There has been a unanimous demand to tie relations with Israel to progress on the peace process," Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Shara said outside the meeting.

"Israel is wrecking the peace process and the basis on which it was established," he said.

Sources in the Israel Prime Minister's Office Sunday night described these statements as "manoeuvres of pressure that are counterproductive to the peace process. Israel will not act under pressure."

In June, a summit of Arab leaders in Cairo warned that Arab states would reconsider their role in the peace process and economic ties with Israel if it did not stick to the principle of trading land for peace.

Little progress has been made since then. Negotiations with the Palestinians have gone nowhere, despite the recent meeting between Netanyahu and Yasser Arafat. Peace talks with Lebanon and Syria, meanwhile, have not resumed.

While not detailing the steps to be taken, Arab officials have suggested boycotting multilateral talks between Israel and Arab countries. That, however, will apparently not include the economic summit in Cairo scheduled for Nov. 12 to 14. Despite earlier threats, Egyptian officials now say that conference will be convened as scheduled.

"The Arab states need the multilateral meetings more than Israel does. By withdrawing, they are harming themselves more than they can harm Israel," a source in the Prime Minister's Office said.

Netanyahu also dismissed the threats to end regional cooperation.

"We are not taking these things seriously," he said Sunday in an interview with Israel Radio. "I don't recommend anyone use these tools against us. It will not help."

Arafat complained Saturday that Israel was only play-acting at peace and was not serious about implementing agreements it had made with the PLO.

"There is an impasse not only on the Palestinian track but on the Syrian and Lebanese tracks, where nothing has been implemented concerning the agreements signed and agreed upon," Arafat told reporters at the Arab summit.

"There is an attempt only to make a political show, to give the impression that there is a tendency from the Israelis to move in the right direction, while on the ground there is nothing concrete in our hands," he added.

"This was an important opportunity to put my Arab brothers in the picture regarding the dangerous circumstances that we are going through and that directly affect the peace process," Arafat said.

CJC refuses Bloc's request

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) refused to go along with a request from Bloc Québécois (BQ) leader Michel Gauthier that it denounce Howard Galganov, the anti-separatist crusader who spoke at Wall Street's Harvard Club last week, especially for his calling the Parti Québécois (PQ) government "bastards."

CJC Quebec region's community relations chair Max Bernard appeared taken aback that Gauthier should think that because Galganov is Jewish, CJC has any responsibility for his actions. Galganov has no ties to CJC, nor has he claimed to speak for the Jewish community, Bernard said, adding that Jews are not "homogenous."

'Mr. Galganov has apologized [for his remarks] ... There is no reason for us to intervene just because he is Jewish ... We have nothing else to say."

Bernard said Galganov appears to have been a victim of a "smear campaign" among some of the French-language media and certain nationalists for their focus on his having been involved with the Jewish Defence League (JDL) in his youth. On the eve of Galganov's trip to New York, Gauthier emerged from a one-hour closed-door meeting with CJC officials at its national headquarters and told the media that he had asked CJC to "disassociate itself from the remarks" of Galganov.

Fighting Neo-Nazism

Reform Threatened

JERUSALEM – An Israel-based group of the the Reform movement is criticizing the Jerusalem police for failing to find those responsible for making telephone threats to the movement's office.

The Israel Religious Action Centre, an agency of the World Union for Progressive Judaism, filed the complaints after coming under a barrage of anonymous hate calls in the past three months.

Police officials said they had traced some of the calls to telephones located near the chassidic yeshivot of Gur and Slonim in haredi areas of Jerusalem.

Reservists Not Pleased

Patt To Head Israel Bonds

NEW YORK – Former Likud minister Gideon Patt has been appointed president and chief executive officer of Israel Bonds.

He will take over the international operation after Maj. Gen. (Ret.) Nathan Sharony leaves the position in December.

PM Defends Policies

WASHINGTON – Faced with mounting pressure from the United States to redeploy Israeli troops from most of Hebron, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu went on the offensive to defend his government's policies in a whirlwind visit here.

At the same time, Netanyahu sought to focus attention on finding a formula to resume talks with Syria during his second visit to Washington since taking office in June.

European Shul Reopens

BUDAPEST – A former Israeli prime minister, the president of Hungary and a host of foreign dignitaries recently joined thousands of Jews here for the reopening of Europe's largest synagogue.

The reopening of the Dohany Street Synagogue came days before another reinauguration – of Bulgaria's 137-year-old Sofia Synagogue, the largest in that country and one of Europe's most ornate.

CJC Mission

WASHINGTON – Canadian Jewish Congress president Goldie Hershon, Holocaust Remembrance Committee co-chair Nate Leipciger and war crimes committee chair Irving Abella recently led a group of federal MPs on a study visit to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Kemp On The Ropes

WASHINGTON – Republican vice-presidential candidate Jack Kemp has found himself locked in a torrent of criticism for heaping praise on part of Louis Farrakhan's philosophy.

When asked in an interview about his opinion of the Nation of Islam leader's self-help philosophy for the black community, Kemp said, "It's wonderful, it's wonderful."

CONGRESS, WELFARE FUND MERGER PROPOSED

The United Jewish Welfare Fund (UJWF) and the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) are planning on merging. Julius Hayman, a member of the Save CJC Committee, and John Geller, a member of the National Executive of Congress, presented their views in The CJN.

Hayman: This is a proposal which the community must reject. The UJWF has its specific responsibilities and is, generally, fulfilling these responsibilities adequately. The CJC, too, has its unique functions and is performing reasonably well. Nothing can be gained by merging. Much would be lost.

Geller: The proposed merger would have the desirable effect of creating a strong Jewish Community Council which would be an integral part of Congress. No organization can stand still. Unless it is prepared to change when necessary, it will cease to have relevance.

Responsibility.

As an integral part of Toronto's Jewish community, we do more than offer a service - we accept the responsibility of fulfilling some of the most meaningful religious and social traditions of our community.

This has been a tradition in our family for four generations.

Na'amat puts Quebec minister on hot seat

Boisclair calls meeting 'form of defeatism'

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec Minister for Relations with Citizens Andre Boisclair got a taste of the anxiety in the Jewish community when members of a women's organization challenged his dismissal of the seriousness of current language tensions.

At one point when the level of grumbling rose, Boisclair, 30, reminded his audience that he had come out of "goodwill" and that he expected a "respectful hearing even if you do not share my point of view."

Boisclair had been invited by Na'amat to speak on the topic Why Should Our Children Stay in Quebec? In his prepared text, he dealt little with the subject directly, suggesting the question was "a form of defeatism."

He did say young anglophones should stay, "above all, because Quebec is their home" and that "Quebec society cannot afford the luxury of losing its most precious asset: human capital and brains."

However, he insisted that they are leaving mainly because they find better jobs elsewhere and that this is not unique to anglophones. Many young francophones are also going outside Quebec for employment, he said.

On a different but related matter, Boisclair maintained that the underrepresentation of non-francophones in the civil service is not the issue; it is rather that young people under 30 in general do not hold a fair share of the jobs. (Only 2.5 percent of the permanent staff is that age; and 15.8 percent of those on contract, he said.)

"Working as a civil servant is not the only measure of participation in Quebec society. You can't conclude you are excluded because of that."

Activists criticized

He suggested young anglophones and francophones are getting along better than their elders. "It's easy to find success stories of young anglophones and francophones pooling their expertise and going into business ... Personally, I am as at home on Crescent Street as on St. Denis Street."

The tone of the evening was set when Evelyn Haber introduced the minister by stating that the Parti Quebecois' (PQ) "vision" appears to exclude minorities, yet "we are asked to renounce our country ... the country we love for giving us undreamed of opportunities, and to trust" in the new one the PQ wants.

Things became more tense in the question period when Wendy Small compared the certificate of eligibility that she needs for her two children to attend English schools to the armbands that Jews wore in Europe during World War II to show who they were.

Rosa Finestone was applauded when she said Jews are ready to be part of a French society, "but not at the expense of separation," and this is causing "deep angst."

Boisclair criticized anglophone rights activists who threaten to boycott stores that do not post bilingual signs according to Bill 86.

The audience of about 70 women rattled Boisclair with their obvious disagreement, after his defence of the law restricting immigrants to French schools. "It is not the responsibility of the state to finance [schooling of immigrants] outside the French network."

In response to a question on whether the political uncertainty is having a negative effect on the economy, Boisclair said he thought some investors are holding up projects "for partisan reasons," rather than making decisions on economic facts, and thereby contributing to the uncertainty.

Boisclair was confident independence will be soon. "When a nation is walking as Quebec is doing, it will never stop ..."

Asking forgiveness of other people

It is customary during the 10 days of awe, the period between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, for individuals to seek forgiveness from family and friends for any injury, slight or harm caused to them intentionally or unintentionally. As with all of the customs developed by our sages, this one too is profoundly effective.

It elevates human behavior.

In this case, it removes "seeking forgiveness" from the realm of the abstract to the realm of the concrete, from merely thinking about the other to actually having to look into his eyes. When spoken sincerely, the phrases, "I am sorry," or "Please forgive me," pave a path to the heart. And it is generally true to say that on this path, understanding and reconciliation are frequent travellers.

Seeking forgiveness from another human being is one of the key "religious" aspects of the 10 days of awe. But it is still only a prelude to seeking forgiveness from God on Yom Kippur itself.

The confessional prayer in the Yom Kippur machzor is a work of compelling and powerful poetry.

It is written in the plural voice yet is recited by the individual. It is rooted firmly within a community context but is meant to tug at the individual conscience. "Transgressions" are listed according to category of behavior in an alphabetical acrostic. The list is comprehensive and thus one with which all of us are familiar and for which all of us have reason to seek forgiveness.

It deftly combines in one moving utterance the individual with the community. It can therefore be legitimately described as a great equalizer aimed both at the conscience of the wealthy and at the poor, at the pious and at the secular, at the self-assured and at the self-conscious. We appeal to God, as it were, on an equal footing, which, after all, is the only way we can imagine that God would receive our appeals.

If forgiveness is appropriate for individuals, it is no less so for The CJN. The paper itself has also inadvertently caused injury or slight. Thus, we too beg the forgiveness of those whom we have injured.

We make mistakes. We try very hard not to, but mistakes occasionally creep into the paper.

Because we trade in words, those mistakes generally bear repercussions ranging from mild to severe for the people whom they have affected.

When we become aware of a mistake, we try immediately to correct the record. But it is true, unfortunately, that the correction does not go as far in undoing the injury as the original mistake goes in creating it.

Possibly the worst of all mistakes is the failure to give proper credit to an author, to fail to identify someone, who, having labored to create an original work, is nevertheless unrecognized for it. On page 2 of today's paper, we acknowledge having made such a mistake.

In the Rosh Hashanah greetings supplement to last week's issue, we published a very moving story called Bread for Katzenelleboigen. We identified the author as being David Shentow. But that was an error. Nestor Hobe was the author. Hobe wrote the story that Shentow recounted to him, enshrining it forever through love and reverence, onto the pages of public record.

The mistake was as ironic as it was painful. For Hobe's story was the very first item which I had decided to include in the Rosh Hashanah supplement. I spoke with him after I read the story some months ago, commending him and thanking him for submitting it to us. In the busy, frenzied race against deadlines, I failed to catch the error and correct it before sending the paper to press.

Other omissions, while equally as innocent, bear less serious consequences. An example which comes to mind is the mistake which we committed when we published an essay by Prof. Martin Lockshin in which he called on Orthodox Jews to search their souls. It was written in the aftermath of the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. It was a delicate and controversial subject which demonstrated resolve and no small measure of courage by the author.

In the concluding paragraph, we left out the word "not." Of all the words to have left out! Though discernible from the context, the proper meaning of the paragraph had been entirely altered from that which the author had intended.

As I have written in the past, the mandate of The CJN as ordained by its directors is "to serve the Jewish people in Canada, in Israel and in all its habitations." The paper does this by attempting to inform in the best, most reliable and most comprehensive manner that it can. In trying to fulfil our mandate, we do indeed make mistakes.

It is appropriate then, at this time of year, that I apologize to anyone who may have felt injury or slight because of our mistakes. To them I say "I am sorry. Please forgive me."

Moscow lied about fate of Wallenberg, says sister

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Why has Moscow stuck to its tired story that Swedish World War II hero Raoul Wallenberg died in a Soviet prison in 1947 when there is ample evidence suggesting the contrary?

"They lie," comes the unusually blunt answer from Wallenberg's half-sister, Nina Lagergren, an otherwise charming, modest grandmother of 10 from Stockholm. "They have always lied."

But Lagergren's Swedish sense of fair play is soon evident: "The Russians now have difficulty maintaining that story because they don't believe it themselves anymore. And we never believed what they said from the start."

Lagergren, now 75, prefers to be known as Wallenberg's sister. "We were very close," she recalled in an interview last week, after a bronze bust in tribute to her famous relative was unveiled in Earl Bales Park [CJN, Sept. 12]. "He was my best friend, my idol. Nobody knew him as I did."

One of the few true heroes of the war, Wallenberg is credited with using his diplomatic status to rescue 100,000 Budapest Jews from certain death in the Holocaust. Working feverishly from the Hungarian capital's Swedish legation in the last half of 1944, he issued an estimated 25,000 fake Swedish passports (the Schutz-pass) to Jews — placing them under the protection of the neutral government in Stockholm — spirited them to safe havens, and persuaded the Nazis to call off the razing of Budapest's largest Jewish ghetto, with its 75,000 inhabitants.

For his troubles, Wallenberg, a non-Jew, was arrested by invading Soviet troops in January 1945, taken to Moscow and never heard from again.

Thus began one of the great mysteries of this century.

In the last 20 years, Wallenberg's fate — and the tantalizing prospect that he may still be alive — has also spawned a veritable cottage industry of books, documentaries, articles and even a Hollywood treatment starring Richard Chamberlain as the hero. Cutting through all of it has been Lagergren's relentless efforts to find out what really happened to her older brother.

In the chaos of the war's dying days, Russian-controlled radio in Budapest announced that Wallenberg had been killed, probably by the Nazis or their Hungarian compatriots, the Arrow Cross. That created a certain passivity on the part of the Swedish government, until rumors kept surfacing that he was alive in a Soviet prison cell.

It took until 1957 for Moscow to unearth a document stating Wallenberg had died 10 years earlier of a heart attack in Lubyanka prison. The problem was that no one could vouch for the document's veracity, since the official who signed it was dead and his boss had long since been purged by Stalin. It's the same story Moscow clings to, to this day.

That despite at least a dozen reported sightings of the hero by newly released prisoners through the 1950s, including one German PoW who said he communicated with the Swede by knocking on their mutual cell wall. This sort of testimony continued until the early 1980s.

One telling episode involved a Soviet general who had been imprisoned by Stalin. The general said in 1979 that he once spent three weeks with Wallenberg in the gulag. He was promptly arrested and five days later, was dead of a "heart attack."

Nina Lagergren

Then, in 1989, a breakthrough: Lagergren and her brother, Guy von Dardel, were summoned to Moscow. There, authorities presented them with Wallenberg's diplomatic passport, driver's licence, food ration coupons, an address book, a packet of Hungarian currency and a gold cigarette case.

"They put this box with all these items in front of us," Lagergren recalls, "and they thought I was going to cry and say there's no more hope. But I reacted the other way around, and said, 'Now we must do everything we can to get the truth.' "

For Lagergren, the episode reinforced Moscow's mendacity in the matter. "They said they found them in a storeroom on a shelf, just by accident. They said a cleaner found them."

But the meeting established a Swedish/Russian working group that still meets regularly. In 1990, Moscow agreed to cooperate with an international panel of inquiry into Wallenberg's fate, headed by Montreal human rights lawyer Irwin Cotler. Among other things, the panel found that the Soviets never conducted a serious investigation into Wallenberg's disappearance.

After the collapse of the Soviet Union, documents released by Moscow showed that the KGB, the defunct secret police, took extensive pains to expunge from its records the name of Raoul Wallenberg.

But the big question has always been whether anyone can survive this long in the brutal Soviet penal system. "I think you can," Lagergren submits. "There are cases of people surviving for 40 and more years." Her brother, she says, had the mental toughness needed to survive.

But he was also charming, funny and sophisticated. She was nine years younger than he was and she very nearly worshipped him. Wallenberg's mother remarried after his father died of cancer before he was born, and his paternal grandfather was determined to shape his upbringing.

The young Wallenberg was sent to university in Michigan and learned banking in South Africa and in 1936, in Haifa, where he first met Jews who had fled Nazi Germany. He was fluent in German, English, French and Russian, and exuded elegance.

Back in Sweden, he had many business partners, among them a Hungarian Jew who put his name forward as an emissary from Sweden who could be dispatched to Budapest at the behest of the War Refugee Board, set up by then U.S. president Franklin Roosevelt.

By that time — the summer of 1944 — the Germans had, in just two months, deported an estimated 400,000 Jews from the Hungarian countryside to their deaths. Now, they set their sights on the 200,000 in Budapest.

"Raoul was aware of the danger," Lagergren said. "But he went very enthusiastically. That's the kind of person he was."

Once in the thick of his mission, Wallenberg bullied, blustered and threatened the Nazis with a vigor that impressed even hardened German soldiers. That doesn't surprise his sister. "He could be soft, then very determined."

Today, Wallenberg is an honorary citizen of Canada, the United States and Israel. Monuments and streets named after him can be found in several cities, Toronto, Montreal and Budapest among them, but none in Sweden. Lagergren sighs. "Apparently, you don't become a prophet in your own country."

Apart from pressuring Moscow to cough up the truth, or at least a death certificate, Lagergren and her brother are now on a mission to get schools named after Wallenberg. (There are already two, in New York and San Francisco).

"It's important for young people who are depressed because they feel they can't do anything to know that one man can make a difference," she says. "After finding Raoul, that's the most important thing."

Israel gets ready to launch own 'United Way'

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For years, Avraham Burg had a dream: that Israelis would be as generous to their own domestic charities as the Diaspora had been for decades.

Not that Israelis have shallow pockets. But over the years, there has been a backlash, especially among younger people, over the perception of Israel as a charity case, and in general, there has been lacking a Western style of giving.

Now, Burg, the youthful (41) chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel, is about to have his dream realized: this Chanukah, the Jewish state is scheduled to launch its first-ever national makbit (literally, central fund), along the lines of North America's United Way campaigns.

The yet-unnamed campaign has already hired staff and hopes to raise millions of shekels for the poor, women's shelters, seniors, immigrants and wherever the need is greatest.

Avraham Burg

"I call it Jews for Jews," the energetic Burg told The CJN last week while in Toronto for meetings with United Jewish Appeal fundraisers. "On the one hand, Israel is doing well economically, but on the other, those who do not have, have a lot less. The social gap is troubling. Half-a-million Israelis are below the poverty line."

Burg is banking the campaign will succeed, mainly because he believes in the adage that charity begins at home. But the idea is also an extension of one of his old themes: that education — Jewish education — anchors almost everything.

When Burg took the reins of the beleaguered Jewish Agency last year, he said his top three priorities were education, education and education.

"That hasn't changed," he notes. It all comes down, he adds, to whether "the Jewish people can survive without an external enemy. The answer is education. It is our only instrument."

Unfortunately for Burg, who would rather pursue his other dream of high-quality, universal Jewish education, much of the last year has been taken up by cutting the Jewish Agency's massive deficit.

Established in 1929, the Agency is Israel's central distributor of money raised by United Jewish Appeal campaigns the world over. Its main task is in immigrant absorption, which has exploded since 1989. It also employs some 1,000 short- and long-term shlichim (emissaries), mainly in the former Soviet Union, who teach Hebrew and Jewish values and prepare Jews for emigration to Israel. All that has cost a lot of money.

Now, Burg has assumed the unenviable task of having to slash the Agency's budget by a whopping $500 million (US) over the next five years.

He's blunt when asked why his organziation needs such a dramatic budget cut: "Fundraising has failed to supply the general needs of the Jewish people." Thus the need for a strong, domestic sense of charity within Israel itself, and of new ways of doing things.

Already, in year one, the Agency has cut, painfully, one of its more popular programs: the government has agreed to take over its $60 million Youth Aliyah department.

Borrowing a North American phrase, Burg says he's also "downsized" the Agency's staff by 500 people. "We are now more effective and leaner," he says.

Burg is a long way from abandoning his quest for more and better Jewish education, but now says the Agency's most immediate priorities are aliyah and klitah (immigration and absorption) and more twinnings of Israeli communities with those in the Diaspora. Currently, 80 communities around the world are twinned with 23 Israeli regions and towns, providing economic boosts traditional fundraising cannot.

Jewish groups warn of messianic holiday services

TORONTO – The Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress and Jews for Judaism, the counter-missionary group, are warning of "enticing" brochures advertising High Holy Day and Sukkot services at messianic congregations around Metro.

Jews for Judaism director Julius Ciss says the services are at congregations that worship Jesus as the messiah.

Ciss says the brochures and other printed matter used by the congregations often employ Jewish symbols, like stars of David and shofars, which can attract Jews.

Beth Sar Shalom a messianic congregation that rents space in a church on Finch Avenue West, recently distributed brochures touting Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and Sukkot services with "Russian translation available."

"Come and celebrate atonement through messiah Yeshua," it said. "We are a congregation of Jews and gentiles who believe in Yeshua (Jesus) and Messiah."

It said services are in English "with a touch of Hebrew."

Other messianic groups advertising holidays services are Jews for Jesus and City of David Messianic Fellowship, which meets in the Barbara Frum Library.

Video identifies Kalejs as AK member

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lawyers for alleged Nazi war criminal Konrads Kalejs last week began their defence by playing videotaped testimony from former members of the Arajs Kommando (AK) — and they promptly identified Kalejs as a member of the unit.

Edgars Jurgitis, who worked in the AK's supply section, said he knew Kalejs as a senior lieutenant and company commander: "When he came, he came to the supply department to settle the matters of the company, but how often he came, I cannot tell you."

Jurgitis' evidence was videotaped in September 1987 in Riga, then part of the Soviet Union, as part of a U.S. immigration case against Kalejs. Kalejs, an Australian citizen, was eventually found by U.S. courts to have participated in the wartime persecution of civilians and ordered deported.

In 1994, he moved to Canada. Authorities here are seeking an order removing him, alleging he is not a genuine visitor to Canada and that he participated in war crimes.

Kalejs has denied the charges and says he has come to Canada to clear his name.

Justice Department lawyers representing Canada's Immigration Department have piled up evidence from Kalejs' former comrades-in-arms identifying him as a senior officer in the AK and linking the AK to the mass execution of Jews. The defence has suggested evidence recorded in the former Soviet Union is unreliable.

However, Kalejs' counsel, Win Thompson and Lloyd MacIlquaham, began their defence by playing videotaped testimony of former AK members, which was recorded in the former Soviet Union. The evidence confirmed Kalejs' involvement with the unit and the unit's participation in mass killings.

Jurgitis, who joined the AK shortly after it was formed in July 1941, said he twice guarded areas where mass executions took place. He said the commander of the supply depot, an officer named Elmuts, told him the entire AK complement participated in the shootings.

Jurgitis said he and others from the supply depot stood guard while Jews were shot in the Bikernieki Forest, near Riga.

On another occasion, Jurgitis' supply department accompanied the unit to the town of Rezekne. Jurgitis said he remained with the provisions while the rest of the AK "went somewhere. I don't know where ... I don't know what they did and where they went."

"Didn't they tell you when they returned that they had executed Jews while the local police guarded the execution site?" asked U.S. attorney Ronnie Edelman, representing the Justice Department.

"There were such talks, yes ... I can't tell you whom they shot at, I was not there. But they got their meals when they returned," Jurgitis responded.

Later in Edelman's cross-examination, Jurgitis acknowledged that in December 1941 "there were talks to the effect that [the Jews of Riga] were liquidated" and that members of the AK guarded the Jews as they were led out of the city to their deaths.

In other videotaped testimony presented in Kalejs' defence, Leonids Jansons said he had "vague memories" of Kalejs as a member of the Arajs Kommando.

"As far as I can remember, he worked in July 1941 in the Latvian Security Auxiliary Police," which was more commonly known as the Arajs Kommando.

Jansons said he joined the unit around the same time and worked in its administrative department, doing paperwork and distributing identifying armbands that were decorated with a skull and crossbones.

Jansons said that in July 1941 he participated in arrests and apartment searches in Riga and "in the moving of the arrested people from the prison to the Bikernieki Forest."

Under cross-examination, Jansons offered more details: Jews were brought to the forest, where pits had been dug; as he and others stood guard, the Jews were brought to the edge of the pit where 10 members of the AK methodically shot them in turn.

From 50 to 100 Jews were killed on that particular occasion, Jansons said.

Jansons also testified that he stood guard in August 1941 while a synagogue in the "Moscow" district of Riga was burned down.

The hearing continues.

Haifa mayor's mission to awaken 'Sleeping Beauty'

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Amram Mitzna has made it his mission since becoming mayor of Haifa three years ago to "take a city known to be the Sleeping Beauty [of Israel] and try to awaken it."

The 51-year-old retired army general could as easily use Cinderella as the metaphor for the northern Israeli city where he was raised and educated.

Under his direction, Haifa, Israel's third-largest city, has begun to undergo a transformation to dramatically boost its esthetic and tourism appeal: plans are under way to change the city's airport into an international terminal; a new convention centre is scheduled to open in early winter; new hotels, cultural and sports facilities are being built; public promenades on the beach have opened; and a kilometre-long hillside garden is being built by the Baha'i community.

The garden, for which the Baha'is have budgeted $250 million, will be "a real landmark" with waterfalls and hanging foliage, said Mitzna. Some 40 projects in total are expected to bring in $1 billion in investments by the year 2000.

The mayor visited Toronto and Vancouver recently as part of a whirlwind North American tour to meet with board members of the Haifa Foundation, an international group registered as a charity here in January 1995.

He also met with Mel Lastman, mayor of North York, one of over a dozen cities worldwide to be twinned with Haifa.

A visit scheduled for June was cancelled to allow Mitzna to meet with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu immediately following the latter's election. Mitzna wanted to ensure that Haifa projects begun under the previous Israeli government would continue to receive Netanyahu's support.

As a staunch member of Israel's Labor party, representing a city known as a Labor stronghold, Mitzna doesn't see eye-to-eye with Netanyahu politically, but he is confident that "Haifa-wise, we will get along with them."

Arab and Jewish inhabitants of Haifa continue to coexist peacefully, despite the change to a right-wing national government, said Mitzna in an interview at a North York hotel.

Following the Hebron massacre two years ago, Mitzna took the unusual step of organizing and participating in a demonstration together with local Arabs to condemn the killings.

When he took office, there was some apprehension among Haifa's Arab population, he said. Not only does he have a military background, but the West Bank was under his command during the Intifada. "I was the bad guy."

Amram Mitzna

Now there is even an Arab chapter of the Haifa Foundation in Israel, he said proudly. "It's very unique. Never before did Arabs contribute to Israeli foundations." Foundation scholarships have been established for Arab students and other funds are allocated for projects in Arab neighborhoods.

The foundation supports a variety of community projects, but its main focus is on tourism and "being the informal capital of northern Israel."

Although Mitzna has been criticized for moving too fast in implementing change, he says if it were up to him, he'd move even faster. He is anxious that Haifa not "miss the windows of opportunity that opened the last few years — the economy [booming], peace on our doorstep, our proximity to Lebanon and Jordan. We must be ready for the time when borders will be open again."

Mitzna is convinced that Israel will achieve peace with its Arab neighbors, but not as quickly or nearly as smoothly as he once believed possible.

Mitzna hopes that by the end of his five-year term of office, some of his critics may become supporters. "Politicians promise a lot of things to be elected. If you have five years, people will criticize [at first] and only later on will they recognize the benefits to the city. It's impossible to be popular every day, in every neighborhood. Israel is developing in many places. If [Haifa] falls behind, it will not be able to serve its people."

Farrakhan visits Toronto

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakkan, who once referred to Judaism as "a gutter religion," took time from his speech here last Sunday night to wish the Jewish community a happy New Year.

"I didn't know this was a Jewish holiday [Rosh Hashanah]," Farrakhan told a packed room at the Westin Harbor Castle Conference Centre in his first-ever Canadian appearance. "I do in fact wish members of the Jewish community a happy New Year, but I came to talk to you."

He was referring to the overwhelmingly black crowd — mainly young men — who came to hear Farrakhan's message of black self-reliance and pride.

Prior to his Toronto visit, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) had lobbied federal officials to bar Farrakhan entry to Canada, on the grounds that his record of anti-Semitic statements in the past — including likening Jews to the Devil — provided "reasonable grounds" he would violate the anti-hate provisions of the Criminal Code.

Farrakhan's presence "would constitute an assault" on Canada's efforts to foster harmony, CJC national president Goldie Hershon wrote Citizenship and Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard.

But the immigration department said it could not bar the fiery 63-year-old American preacher because there was nothing to render him inadmissible.

Louis Farrakhan

Farrakhan told the capacity crowd, estimated at between 2,600 and 3,500, that he did not intend to break any laws of Canada.

"And I am certainly not here to try to pit one group against another, one religion against another, or black against white, or white against black, or black against Jew. My aim is to speak truth out of a spirit of love."

He began his three-hour talk with a greeting in English, Arabic and Hebrew.

Despite claims he was not trying to stir up racial tensions, Farrakhan referred to whites as the "enemy." And outside the convention room, his supporters were selling anti-Semitic booklets, including Martin Luther's The Jews and Their Lies.

A thin veneer

It may have been innocently asked, but it was not an innocent question. Last week, Michel Gauthier, the leader of the Bloc Québécois, the official opposition in the House of Commons, asked the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) to disassociate itself from the campaign by Howard Galganov to discredit the separatist government of Lucien Bouchard.

Galganov is not a member of the CJC. He does not represent them. Nor is he campaigning against separatism in its name.

Nevertheless, in Gauthier's mind the fact that Galganov is Jewish was a sufficient link to the CJC to justify his request. It is Galganov's religion, plain and simple, which ties him in Gauthier's mind to all his co-religionists, as embodied by the CJC. The insidiousness of the thought process is very unsettling and deeply troublesome. It is an example of the group stereotyping of Jews which, in every century since the early days of the church, has resulted in collective accusation, collective defamation and the collective "guilt" of a people.

As the Globe and Mail pointed out in its editorial of Sept. 13, "Only someone completely ignorant of history could fail to see how disturbing that might be to [the] Jews in Quebec... If Mr. Galganov were Presbyterian, would the Bloc have complained to the Scottish Societies of Canada? If he were Catholic, would it have gone to the Catholic Civil Rights League? Somehow, we doubt it."

Gauthier not only fails to see how disturbing his behavior was, he also sees no reason to apologize. However much he and other separatists profess to want to calm the fears of the "ethnic" voter, it is clear they have no real understanding of those fears. The separatists' tolerance for diversity is apparently a thin veneer, a mere patina of sufferance, which scratches away at the slightest agitation or when their agenda is challenged. If Gauthier's response is typical, they cannot be trusted.

The sorrow of others

The Yom Kippur liturgy is a pathway of poignant pleading. Fallible, vulnerable, we entreat God to sustain us past our mortality for yet another year. But these entreaties to God lead us inescapably through corridors of self-discovery. For example, one of the most deeply stirring prayers of Yom Kippur begins with the words Shma koleinu, hear our voices. We recite it four times. It is a short prayer, succinctly written, with a simple honesty that cuts to the common centre of all human existence. Two verses in particular typify its moving message:

Please do not cast us aside in our old age,
When our strength ebbs, do not abandon us.
Please do not abandon us, dear God... (Our translation)

It is a melancholy, almost pitiable cry seeking God's intervention in our lives. In truth however, it is for us, human beings here on earth, to assist God in his work from heaven. For after all, we are partners in the responsibility of making the world a better place.

Thus, as virtually every level of government in every Western jurisdiction continues to reduce its social and welfare programs, we must ask ourselves how we can help those individuals who find themselves, suddenly and frighteningly, "cast aside" or "abandoned" by a society no longer able, or willing, to help carry some of their burdens. If Yom Kippur provides any lesson, it is surely that the sorrows of others are also our own. We must never remain indifferent to those sorrows. How we respond to the sorrows of others is part of what we discover as we walk along the path of poignant pleading, asking favor for ourselves.

Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

Hungarian Olympic champion was Jewish

The article entitled "Olympic Games 1936" by Rabbi Gunther Plaut begs for more information.

The most decorated medalist in the 1952 and 1956 Olympics was a Jewish woman named Agnes Keleti, who, representing Hungary, won a total of 10 medals — five gold, three silver and two bronze, all in gymnastics.

This woman defected in Melbourne in 1956, later immigrating to Israel, where she became the coach of the national gymnastics team.

It is evident that Jewish people in Hungary were able to display their prowess and skills and climb to the very top of their various ladders in world competition. This is outstanding in that it was from Hungary in the summer of 1944 that 600,000 of the 900,000 Hungarian Jews "deported" died in the Nazi death camps.

It should finally be noted that Keleti still holds the all-time Hungarian record for medals won by an individual.

Refugee story about Tzfat is false

Re: the article, "Palestinian refugees in Syria dream of returning home after half a century," in the Montreal Gazette, Aug. 22.

While I sympathize with the plight of any displaced person regardless of their nationality, religion etc., I feel that certain distortions of the events described deserve to be corrected.

Abed Abdullah has apparently an erroneous picture of both the events that took place as well as of the state of the area his parents left behind.

He cannot remember, since he was not there. I was!

First, did Abed's father and grandfather ever mention to him that the day after the United Nations ended the British Mandate of Palestine and declared it as a home for the Jewish people, not one, but five Arab armies, well trained and equipped had attacked this tiny just-born Jewish state?

Was Abed told that under the British Mandate, Jews were not permitted to own any kind of firearms and the ragtag Israeli forces only possessed some rifles smuggled in by the kibbutzim? An Israeli company of soldiers was lucky to have three or four different makes of rifles, each make requiring a different calibre of bullets, of which there were not enough available anyway. Handguns were at such premium that only officers from the rank of major were given one by the army.

About the very beautiful picture of the land, let me tell you that 48 years ago, Tzfat was a village with houses mostly built from clay mixed with straw, one storey with barren floors. There were hardly any trees or birds but mostly wild cactus plants, as tall as six feet.

The paradise-like picture that Abed describes was built with hard sweat by Israelis and mostly under the Syrian cannon bombardment which lasted until the Israelis captured the Golan Hills across the lake from Tzfat.

Lastly, a word to the wise about the approximately 700,000 Arabs who left their homes in 1948. They were not chased away, but left or ran away of their own volition. Why did they run? Perhaps they feared reprisals for the continuous attacks on Jews that happened throughout the many years of the British Mandate, attacks for which they were not held accountable by anyone.

By the way, how many refugees are there now? Two million, four million or maybe six million. Are they all descendants of the 700,000 who left in 1948?

Jewish schools in Ottawa

The article in the issue of Aug. 22, entitled "Ottawa: a hot spot for Jewish life," calls out for clarification.

Yitzhak Rabin High School, for instance, is the first co-ed full-time Jewish high school in the city, serving three grades this year. There is also a boys' yeshivah and a girls' yeshivah here. There are two day schools, and four afternoon schools. There is a high school program that runs in conjunction with a public high school, "Ariel," as well as the Akiva high school-aged program.

Wants to thaw the big chill

Re: "The big chill puts discussion on hold" (CJN, Aug. 22).

I was struck by the poignancy of the photograph that accompanied the article: a student from the March of the Living draped in an Israeli flag, walking down railway tracks.

I was reminded that no matter where one goes, one will almost always be able to find at least one person who will find something offensive. Should this mean an end to writings, songs and images that are ultimately challenging and moving for most of us? Congratulations to Eli Rubenstein for pointing out a problem which leads so many of us to feel scared.

Piety must not squeeze out morality

By RABBI HOWARD JOSEPH

Saturday evening, Nov. 4, 1995. A fateful time. Shabbat is over. The first news reports are in. As I look back upon the past year, I realize that a day has not passed during which I did not think of the event that shook us: the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

As a professional Jew involved with public Jewish life on a daily basis, I was profoundly shocked. As a private Jewish individual, this tragedy led me to reconsider some my most fundamental religious attitudes.

As a professional Jew, I was depressed. Is this what Jewish life was becoming? Is this the way we will be solving our disagreements? How long will it take after the establishment of the modern State of Israel to learn how to run a modern state? Or did we learn too quickly and begin imitating too readily the rest of the world? How much more pain and suffering will we cause ourselves in the process? After all, we have not had such a major assassination of a Jewish leader for about 2,600 years since the Babylonian appointee over Jerusalem, Gedaliah ben Ahikam, was murdered. This further aggravated the subjugated condition recently begun with the destruction of the Temple, the conquest and the exile. Indeed, so shocking was this event that we still maintain a fast day in his memory on the day after Rosh Hashanah. It has now assumed new and contemporary relevance.

Of course, there was also the sadness that one of the great modern leaders of our people had been destroyed. For many of us, Yitzhak Rabin was the symbol of the new Israeli type that was emerging. He devoted his life to the defence of our people since before the state's establishment and participated with distinction in each major military crisis. He seemed to know when to be kind and when to be tough, capable of great tenderness and yet fierce in battle. He was not a professional politician interested in being elected for the sake of power. He appeared to be a man with a lifelong mission, who now needed the power of election to achieve that mission. Many of us felt that if he was guiding the uncharted waters of a peace process that it was in pretty good hands, even if we did not understand or agree with all his positions and policies.

As a private Jew, many of my previously held attitudes seemed naive. These issues concerned the relationship between religion and morality, nationalism and religion, nationalism and morality, democracy and religion and many others.

For me, a religious person should naturally be committed to the welfare of the community and nation and should naturally pursue a morally elevated lifestyle. Those religious persons who did not do so, I believed, were being less "religious" than they should be. Maybe they were selfish, unrefined or just plain weak. But in the Rabin murder we faced a different reality.

It was not weakness that motivated the killer. It was in fact his claimed commitment to God and nation that led him to his immoral act and its justification. He believed and he still believes that he did the right thing. The dispute was one of principle and not greed. The killer totally delegitimated Rabin's principles — they were against the will of God. Only his own principles were correct.

Some explanation was required as to how this dynamic worked. What indeed is the relationship among the dimensions of religion, national commitment and morality.

This was all the more pressing and depressing because the killer was not really a "stranger" to me. No, I had never met him. But I thought I knew him and many others like him. In fact, like Baruch Goldstein before him, I know many like both of them. They both come from the religious Zionist background in which I grew up. This orientation is committed to religion and the nation. It is open to modern secular studies and many within this group believe that these studies enhance our religious life while they also enable us to participate in the creation of a modern state.

Awful deed

One was able to dismiss Goldstein somewhat, for he did not survive to tell his story. It seemed that he may have just cracked and he did his awful deed on that Purim day in a deficient mental state. But Rabin's killer survived to tell his story over and over again without any changes or regrets. From that story. it appears that everything he learned in his yeshivot led directly and unrelentingly to his crime against our people. As Rabbis Yehuda Amital and Aharon Lichtenstein said after the murder, "We are particularly pained by the fact that the perpetrator of this abominable murder grew out of the community with which we are identified, acting out of distortion of its values." How is this possible? What in the system leads to such a painful and lethal distortion?

I found guidance from the writings of Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, one of the most famous disciples of the Neziv, Rabbi Naphtali Zvi Yehuda Berlin. Rav Kook, who died in 1935, was active in the Zionist movement at the beginning of this century and became the first modern Ashkenazi chief rabbi in re-state Palestine. He wrote voluminously on all areas of Jewish knowledge from a kabbalistic orientation which was open to modern philosophic and scientific thought. He was one of the remarkable men of our century.

Rav Kook depicts three powerful forces that shape human beings and human societies: religion, nationalism and morality. A healthy person and a healthy society must blend these factors into a positive synthesis in order to sustain and further its life. When one of these factors expands at the expense of the others, the imbalance can be dangerous and even fatal: extremism results. The inner spirit of each force, its truth and love, are emptied from each of the vessels. The spirit can only be maintained by a well balanced and well proportioned vessel. Any extreme, in any of these aspects, risks the whole venture. Religion, nationalism and morality must each find its proper level and work together to sustain life. They also must leave room for each other while challenging each other not to expand beyond their proper spheres. Each must learn the limits of its scope and influence, in order to create harmony. Pushed to excess, any one of these constituents destroys the balance. This jeopardizes the entire process. Life cannot be sustained and nurtured unless proportion and balance prevail. Pessimism sets in and life deteriorates.

Rav Kook's analysis has a distinctly contemporary ring, despite being written almost 90 years ago. He seems to accurately portray the divisions in our community, then and now. We can locate elements of the community that are religious, nationalistic and humanistic, but we find very few who integrate — or even try to integrate — all the constituents. Religious people, for example, will make their religious commitment supreme. However, how will they conceive the scope of that commitment? In a narrow ritualistic fashion, or as they should know full well, with a commitment that requires of them a love of the nation and a moral duty to all? Can they live up to these demands?

At one time, it was the religious-Zionist camp that strove for this balanced perspective. Under the influence of Rav Kook and others, this was their stated ideal. Rabin's murderer has called all that into question.

Our great religious texts contain all these elements. They challenge us to harmonize all the forces together despite giving supremacy to the relationship with God. For a religious person, this is so important that it is liable to overshadow the other elements. Therefore, none other than God makes the demands upon us for loyalty to our people and moral responsibility. If it were so easy and natural, it would not be necessary to command this. God knows the dangers of intense religious enthusiasm.

Intense nationalism or humanism also bear dangers. Taken to extreme they too can produce tragedy. We all know very well what the ideologies of this century have produced: Nazism or national socialism on the so-called right, totalitarian communism on the left. No century ever experienced more mass-murder than was produced by these extremist ideologies in our time. Unfortunately, Rav Kook was right on.

The sages of our tradition have always recognized the dangers of intense piety. Even those immersed in Torah study and performance of mitzvot are not immunized from committing terrible acts. On the contrary, they may even be more vulnerable and liable. After all, they live on such a high pitch of intensity, enthusiasm and inspiration. They must exercise restraint, discipline and judgment or else they can fall into the traps of self-righteous disregard for others.

Love poetry

The Talmud (Yoma 23a) relates: "It happened once that two (young) Kohanim were running evenly up the ramp [in the Temple, in order to be first and thus be the one to perform the sacrificial service of the day.] One of them intruded in the way of the other. He drew a knife and plunged it into his heart … The father of the [slain] youth came and found him in his death-throes. He said, 'May he be your atonement — my son is yet in his death-throes and the knife is not yet defiled!' This teaches us that ritual purity was more serious in their eyes than bloodshed."

True love of God is conceived of very differently by our tradition. The sages recognized that love of God is similar to human love. In that regard, a lover seems to desire that his beloved will be admired by others. Hence, love poetry not only endears the beloved to the lover, but also instructs others about the virtues of the beloved. This is true for the love for God as well.

There is a Talmudic comment to the verse Ve'ahavta et HaShem Kelokechah (You shall love the Lord your God): cause the name of Heaven to be loved through you. You should read, study, apprentice yourself with scholars and deal kindly with people. What will people say? Blessed is his father who taught him Torah, blessed is his teacher who taught him Torah; how unfortunate are those people who did not study Torah, for look at him who has studied Torah: how pleasant are his ways, how refined his deeds … But one who reads, studies and apprentices himself with scholars while he is not honest in dealings with people … what do they say about him? Woe to him who has studied Torah, woe to his father who taught him Torah, woe to his teacher who taught him Torah" (Yoma 86a).

Note how the second part does not say "woe to him who has not studied sufficient Torah." It says "woe to him who has studied Torah." This text, contrary to the accepted notion, links his corruption to Torah study and not its absence. He has failed his beloved. Is his love true? If it were, the lover would behave in a proper manner in order to reflect well upon and gain admirers for the beloved. The true lover of God promotes the love of God through proper morally elevated behavior.

The murderer of Yitzhak Rabin claimed to be a lover of God. All he did was for the sake of God: it was God's wish that he executed. In actual fact, rather than enhancing God's presence in the world by an act which we call a kiddush HaShem — sanctifying God's Name — he desecrated God's Name in an act known as chillul HaShem. Rather than advancing the cause of religion, he perpetrated a crime against both man and God which led many people to question the value of religion altogether. This is a perfect example of the imbalance spoken of by Rav Kook. Truth and love disappear and important principles such as religion are emptied of meaning.

We live in strange and difficult times. The obvious truths seem lost and forgotten. Maybe we did not realize that no truths are so obvious that they will be automatically perpetuated. They have to be consciously taught and reinforced in order to construct the atmosphere and lifestyle we seek. If not, if we believe that at any one point we have become so perfect that all will continue along its merry way, we are indeed due for some awful surprises. The balanced perspective of life needs affirmation and reaffirmation in order to effectively construct a balanced and wholesome life. This is what we must wish, pray and work for in the new year.

Let us permit Rav Kook to have the final word. In Orot Hakodesh, (3, p. 27), he says, "It is forbidden for piety (yirat shamayim) to squeeze out man's natural morality … If you could imagine piety in such a manner that it had no positive influence upon life, — that there would be a greater tendency to do good and to actualize matters that benefit the individual and the community without it — a piety that lessens this actualization is an illegitimate form of piety."

Opinions

Some urgent questions

At this time of year, it seems, there are more questions than answers. That's why I declined to give the Israel Bonds appeal at my shul on Kol Nidre night. For me, that solemn evening is more about silent reflection than the urgency of a fund-raising drive or, for that matter, the clarity of a political analysis.

By Shira Herzog

Had I accepted the generous invitation, there are a few thoughts I would have shared with my friends and congregation. The Days of Awe are about prayer, hope and commitment. When it comes to Israel and the Jewish world, we pray and hope for peace, for security, and for continuity ... But it has become so much more difficult to take any of these for granted. Ironically, as we have become stronger and more secure, both in Israel and in the Diaspora, the bonds that were forged in our weakness have become more tenuous.

For decades, we prayed that Israel would no longer have to fight for its survival. While peace is not yet at hand with all its neighbors, Israel no longer faces the existential challenge that it did in its early years. Outside of Israel, Jews dreamed of the ability to live free of discrimination and persecution. For North American Jews, these are no longer issues.

For Israel, the challenge is threefold: the challenge of peace, the challenge of community and the challenge of the Jewish world. Benjamin Netanyahu won the last election because he pledged to continue the peace process — not because he promised to stop it. Indeed, the greatest pressure on him to keep his promise is his desire to be re-elected in the year 2000. But while Israelis have indicated their desire to "normalize" their relations with their Arab neighbors, adapting as a society to the challenges of peace is far more difficult.

Israel's symbols and national ethos were created when the nation was literally besieged by hostile enemies. Peace, or the absence of war, requires the creation of symbols that reflect the values of a nation that is strong, secure and prospering economically due to the "dividends of peace."

The challenge of community is not just to acknowledge that the status quo and compromises struck in 1948 among different visions of Israel as a Jewish state are no longer working effectively, due to political and demographic developments over the last 50 years. Rather, it is to understand that how the issues are debated is no less important than what is being debated. Without the glue of a battle for survival, Israelis have to forge a new sense of community that reflects the new realities of the country and its citizens, and identify shared values that reflect at least minimal common denominators.

The challenge of the Jewish world, in turn, is the urgent requirement for a new understanding by Israelis of the partnership for the future with the Jewish world. And if the automatic support of Israeli governments of the past has been replaced by an intense debate in communities outside of Israel on the issues of the day, Israelis have to recognize that Jewish communities yearn for more than political fundraising when Israeli election time rolls around.

We have a threefold challenge as well: the challenge of Israel as a democracy, the challenge of peace and the challenge of community. We proudly proclaim that Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East, but when that democracy exercises its right to change the government, our support for the principle is sorely tested. Can we really respect the collective wisdom of the people that democracy, with all its imperfections, represents?

Our challenge of peace is to see Israel for what it is — the strongest nation and strongest economy in the region, and yet understand that in its strength lie new opportunities for connecting and belonging. We don't need Israel's vulnerability to feel needed. We can rejoice in its strength and affluence, and continue to enrich the quality of life of its citizens through our many contributions.

And finally, can we forge a sense of community and shared values that reflect our own strength, diversity and power? Can we renew and redefine the bonds of the past and create a new legacy of pride, engagement and belonging that we will pass on to our children and grandchildren?

These are tough questions. But they are necessary; they are urgent; they're ours. They are the kind of questions that we should think about as we reflect on the year that passed and the new year that is upon us. Shanah Tovah.

Looking back

The Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada publishes a magazine called Shem Tov, and its summer edition carried a remarkable reprint of an old article. It had appeared in the Toronto Mail & Empire on Sept. 25, 1897, and was written by a recent graduate of the University of Toronto who was practising journalism.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

The article was part of a series entitled Foreigners who live in Toronto and, in retrospect, assumes added interest because the writer was none other than W. L. Mackenzie King who later (from 1921 to 1930 and 1935 to 1948) would become prime minister of Canada. Here are some excerpts which will throw light not only on our Canadian community, but also on the way the man who served as prime minister during a crucial period of this nation looked at our people.

After describing the occupations and backgrounds of the 2,500 Jews then living in the city — and doing this objectively and without the usual superiority displayed by the people of his time — the author goes on to say:

"What has been accomplished in the course of their religion is already too well known to need comment here. The new synagogue on Bond Street (Holy Blossom Temple), dedicated a short time ago, is an edifice which testifies more forcibly than words to the religious zeal of the Jewish people and to the place which they hold in the community today. While it is unquestionably one of the finest structures in Toronto, it is also one of the few of the many churches in the city which are without a cent of debt.

"The Jewish Sunday coming on the busiest days of the week has pressed hard upon some of the poorer Jews. In their efforts to work five days and live seven they have felt the squeeze between the pressure of vigorous religious convictions and the necessary satisfaction of economic needs, but the fidelity with which most of them comply with the demands of their faith is heroic.

"Their families are usually large and the houses of the poor are invariably small, but it is seldom, if ever, that two families are found living in the same house, or that sickness prevails amongst them. Here again religion is operated to affect their material condition.

"The 'unclean thing' is rejected by the Jew, and even to the poorest among them, the custom of keeping separate dishes in the 'milky' cupboard and the 'fleshy' cupboard is rigorously maintained. Moreover, the Jews are very abstemious people. It is a great rarity to see a Jew the worst for liquor ... There are practically no criminals amongst them, and it is only when they quarrel amongst themselves that they give trouble to the police."

The clearly positive view which King had of our community did not, alas, translate itself into accepting a sizable Jewish immigration when our people needed it most, during the 1930s and '40s. There is nothing in this article to suggest that the author saw Jews as a foreign, unassimilable part of the population — a position which later on the unspeakable Fred Blair (the villain of None is Too Many) purveyed with such zeal.

New reading for a new year

Two new Jewish magazines have appeared. They add something different to the liberal end of the socio-political spectrum, alongside magazines like Moment or The Jerusalem Report.

By Morton Weinfeld

The first, Davka, is published by young, radical/hip Jews based in San Francisco. It is striving to link Jewishness to new cultural currents like rap and hip-hop. The issue I saw (in a Barnes and Noble in Burlington, Vt.), featured an article about a Jewish woman supporting tatooing and body piercing, another about Jews involved in rap music (they are at best marginally Jewish), and a short piece by the playwright David Mamet. It is clearly aimed at Jewish generation Xers, and those younger.

The second is commonQuest, published jointly by the American Jewish Committee and Howard University, a distinguished African American educational institution. It is dedicated to fostering rapprochement between Jews and blacks in the United States and is earnestly liberal. While it stresses its commitment to honesty no matter how brutal, it also seeks to restore black-Jewish relations to the harmony which allegedly prevailed in the early civil rights era, before Jesse Jackson, Louis Farrakhan, the O. J. Simpson verdict, Crown Heights, affirmative action debates and the like polarized the two groups.

Both magazines seem like heroic efforts. Is there a sufficiently large constituency of readers of Davka among progressive and avant-garde young Jews alienated from the mainstream Jewish community? It would be easy to dismiss the effort in cynical fashion as being Jewishly shallow. The real issue is not that Davka will ever become a major force of Judaic intellectual renewal. It won't.

What is intruguing is why those alienated and marginal Jews involved in putting out this magazine feel compelled to articulate a Jewish identification. Why not simply let the whole thing slide? Clearly Jewishness in some form retains at the least a symbolic value for them.

The magazine reminded me in some places of a very pale imitation of the Jewish counter-culture of the 1950s (that produced the Havurah movement among other things).

The Davka crowd does not have the Judaic background or commitments of the earlier group. But I suspect that if they persist and survive as a magazine with a following, some space within organized Jewish life will open up for them.

Reading commonQuest (the cover page title had a lower case "c" and a capital "Q;" and why one word and not two?) left me conflicted. Who can be against rapprochement? Here in Montreal, black-Jewish rapprochement has also been in vogue. Last year B'nai Brith co-sponsored a symposium on black-Jewish relations, and more recently the Canadian Jewish Congress co-hosted a commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Jackie Robinson's glorious year with the Montreal Royals. (There is a more explicit common agenda in Montreal, since both groups position themselves as anglophone, federalist communities.)

But Canada is not the United States. There, black-Jewish relations have been nastier.

The problem with commonQuest is the difficulty it will have in trying to find common ground in the two sponsoring communities. Despite joint past struggles, the socio-demographic and economic data point to increasing divergence between black and Jewish communities in the United States, and one suspects, in Canada as well.

One article was a symposium on Jewish and African American (differing) views on the Million Man March in Washington. A second was an excerpt from The Temple Bombing by Melissa Fay Greene. The book recounts the story of a bombing of a pro-integrationist Reform temple in Atlanta in 1958. What stands out from the excerpt is first, how assimilated those Atlanta Reform Jews were in 1958, and second, how the mainstream southern Jewish community did not play an activist, vanguard role in the drive for civil rights.

A magazine is not an ideal vehicle for an intensive group therapy session. I doubt that it will succeed in changing preconceived notions held by both Jews and blacks about the other.

Let me wish all readers, and their families, a Shanah tovah u'metukah — a good and sweet year.

The Kirshner File

Plumbing the puzzle of the Middle East

The Middle East, as it is so often portrayed in the media, is an unfathomable puzzle. But it need not be so. Delve into the following books and the pieces may fit into place.

By Sheldon Kirshner

A History of the Modern Middle East (Westview Press, $24.95 US) provides a first-rate overview of the region. The author, William Cleveland, is a professor at Simon Fraser University in British Columbia.

The book is divided into four parts — the development of Islamic civilization to the 18th century; the era of transformation in the 19th century; the Arab and Jewish struggle for independence; and the region since 1945.

The last segment is of particular interest, covering the age of Gamel Abdel Nasser in Egypt, the role of the United States in the area and the emergence of Ba'athist regimes in Iraq and Syria. Cleveland also expertly deals with the rise of the PLO, Israel and the Arab states, the Arabian peninsula, the Islamic revolution in Iran, the 1990-91 crisis in the Persian Gulf and the Mideast peace process.

All in all, a book of immense value.

The Arab World: Society, Culture and State (University of California Press, $15 US) serves as a complementary volume to A History of the Modern Middle East.

Halim Barakat, a member of Georgetown University's Centre for Contemporary Arab Studies, analyzes the nature of Arab identity, probes social structures and institutions and examines the dynamics of Arab culture.

A fine, thoughtful study.

Inside the Arab World (Harvard University Press, $27.50 US) explores the political, geographic and cultural reasons for the malaise which affects Arab countries today.

Michael Field, an expert on the subject, ranges far and wide as he considers such germane issues as the fragmentation of Arab society, the pervasiveness of corruption and the epidemic of bad government.

Muslim Extremism in Egypt (University of California Press, $12 US) is an incisive survey of the fundamentalist movement, beginning with the founding in 1928 of the still influential Muslim Brotherhood.

Gilles Kepel, a French scholar, offers a broadly conceived interpretation of the movement's leadership and ideology.

Rediscovering Palestine (University of California Press, $20 US) draws an intriguing portrait of Palestinian society in the district of Nablus during the late Ottoman period.

Drawing on local council records, private family papers and Islamic court archives, Beshara Doumani traces the relationship of culture, politics and trade with the production and distribution of cotton, textiles, olive oil and soap.

Jerusalem (Princeton University Press, $19.95 US) is a vivid portrayal of a contested city as seen through the eyes of Jews, Muslims and Christians.

F.E. Peters, a professor of Near Eastern languages, literature and history at New York University, draws upon the first-hand accounts of a multitude of observers — pilgrims, holy men, soldiers, merchants, tourists.

Running the Palestine Blockade (U.S. Naval Institute/Naval Institute Press, $25) tells a compelling story — the clandestine transport of Holocaust survivors to Palestine by the Jewish underground and volunteer American seamen.

The writer, Rudolf Patzert, was the captain of one of the U.S. surplus vessels — the Paducah — which brought the survivors from Europe.

Jerusalem looms large as a pivotal issue

Meron Benvenisti, the former deputy mayor of Jerusalem, has been an observer of the Arab-Israeli dispute for many years, having expressed his liberal views in newspaper columns, public speeches and books.

Now, in his latest work, a dispassionate book entitled Intimate Enemies (University of California Press), Benvenisti zeroes in on the subjects closest to his heart, Jerusalem and Israel's conflict with the Palestinians.

Benvenisti's view of Jerusalem is anything but monochromatic. Jerusalem is fundamental to Israel's identity as a nation, yet he describes it as "a collection of alienated islands ... separated by deep ravines."

He blames Teddy Kollek, the ex-mayor, for having originated and nurtured the myth that Jerusalem is unified. Going one step further, Benvenisti claims that the annexation of Jerusalem was "an illegal act," contrary to international law.

Like most Israelis, Kollek assumed the Palestinians of East Jerusalem would reconcile themselves to the city's unification and enjoy its benefits.

On this issue, Benvenisti is of two minds. On the one hand, the Kollek administration "openly discriminated" against the Arab population with regard to services, allotment of resources, licensing and environmental development. On the other hand, there were "huge improvements" in the Arabs' quality of life during the same period.

This dichtomy, of course, affects Palestinian attitudes. The Arabs support the physical unification of Jerusalem because it is in their interest. However, they reject the political implications of unification, given their desire for a Palestinian state with East Jerusalem as its capital.

Benvenisti adds that Ehud Olmert's victory in the 1994 municipal election ushered in "a new era of polarization" in Jerusalem. Olmert, a right-wing politician, supports Jewish intrusion into Arab neighborhoods and agitation against the current peace process. As a result, Benvenisti maintains, Olmert has thrust Jerusalem into the political maelstrom and exacerbated friction with the Arab population.

The Palestinians, he goes on to say, have studied the Zionist movement assiduously. Above all else, they have learned that subjective will can overcome objective reality, provided the resources of the entire community are mobilized, proto-sovereign institutions are established on the basis of voluntary association, and a pragmatic policy unhampered by absolutist ideologies is pursued.

Benvenisti readily admits that the Oslo peace process came as a surprise to him. The majority of Israeli Jews embraced the 1993 Declaration of Principles because they were weary of the burden of trying to control two million hostile Palestinians in the territories. In his opinion, it interfered with their pursuit of a Western-style consumer economy.

In closing, Benvenisti calls for a confederation between Israel and a Palestinian entity. This arrangement would blend "a vertical geopolitical partition with a horizontal power-sharing partition."

In the present mistrustful climate, the idea sounds far-fetched and unrealistic. But in the Middle East, virtually anything is possible or feasible sooner or later.

THINKING SCIENCE

All over the world, the need to learn the language of science grows more urgent every day. Only a basic grasp of mathematical and scientific thinking equips us to evaluate the impact of new technologies, therapies, and public policies on issues ranging from AIDS, health care and the economy to drugs, the environment, defense and interplanetary space exploration. Scientific literacy has become a critical decision-making tool. ❦ The Weizmann Institute of Science tackles the challenge with zest. ❦ At Israel's foremost research center, top scientists take time to develop new programs for youngsters through high school. The Science Teaching Department trains teachers, publishes journals and devises games, kits and computer materials. Textbooks appear in Hebrew and Arabic. Other youth activities include math-by-mail exchanges, a national math olympiad, science-and-music sessions, and campus visits for demonstrations and workshops in the Youth Village and Garden of Science. Gifted students from Canada and many other foreign countries vie for places in the exciting annual pre-college International Summer Science Program at the Weizmann Institute. ❦ Fostering scientific literacy responds to universal objectives. It deserves support everywhere.

The Weizmann Institute, founded in 1934, is a community of 2,300 scientists, engineers and scientists-in-training engaged in a full agenda of 800 research projects ranging from basic medical research in cancer, AIDS, neurosciences and children's diseases to chemistry, physics, agriculture, computer science and the environment.

Time to examine deeds from past year

By RABBI IRVIN BEIGEL

One of the most distinctive features of the Yom Kippur services is the confession of sins.

In an age in which moral relativism is widespread, the notion that sin exists is itself a bold statement. The machzor reminds us that our conduct is judged by absolute standards. We may not say, "I did it because it is right for me." No organized community can sanction the right of individuals to create their own law, to decide what morally and ethically is right for them. Such an approach would condone, even sanctify, virtually every action no matter how destructive to society as a whole.

A community committed to the standards of right and wrong found in the Torah must ask that "what is right for me" give way before G-d's law. When we act contrary to the teachings of our Torah, chatanu — we have sinned.

The Hebrew word chayt, translated as sin, really means to miss the mark. The word suggests that most of the time we really want to do what is right, but sometimes we fall short and end up doing wrong.

The long list of sins we confess on Yom Kippur reads like an indictment of humanity. One can read it and become depressed, realizing the extent to which human beings can and do stray from decent, moral behavior. Yet, there is one statement on this list which suggests a more positive view of humanity. "For the sin we have committed before You with the evil inclination (yetzer harah.)

If this verse mentions the yetzer harah, what about all the other wrongdoing enumerated? If the evil inclination does not lead us to those sins, it must be the yetzer hatov (the inclination to do good) which is responsible. Most of the time, we do not set out to do wrong. We want to do what is right. Our motivations are the most praiseworthy. Given the chance, most of us try to do that which is moral and ethical. We are not evil by nature. We struggle to do good in the world, even if we sometimes miss the mark.

This favorable evaluation of people carries with it a warning as well. Good intentions are not enough to produce good behavior. Not only must we want to do right, but our actions must meet the test of rightness — the test of Torah and Jewish tradition.

As we approach the solemnity of Yom Kippur, may we examine both our intentions and our deeds. By doing so, may we bring more good into our lives and into the world.

Best wishes for the coming year. G'mar chatimah tovah. May all of our people be sealed for a good year of health, happiness and peace.

Rabbi Beigel is a member of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

Sense of loss, failure awaits at Buchenwald

By ROBIN BERGART

Guest Voices

I recently returned from a student trip to Germany and Poland organized by the United Synagogue's Koach Movement. One of our stops was Buchenwald, the first visit to a former concentration camp for all 25 students in the group. Most of us consciously or unconsciously expected to feel a dramatic change in our environment and our feelings as we drove from Weimar to Buchenwald.

In her article of Aug. 8, Goldie Hershon writes of her recent trip: "When we left Weimar, the sun was shining; when we entered the gates of Buchenwald, it became bitter cold and a fine mist fell."

On the day that our group arrived in Buchenwald, the sun continued to shine and most of us found ourselves confronted, not with overwhelming emotion, but with bewilderment.

Buchenwald concentration camp is now a large, almost empty field of dried up grass and dandelions surrounded by a barbed wire fence. A thick green forest lies beyond the fence. The blocks which housed the prisoners were either demolished after the war or torn down to be used elsewhere as school rooms.

At the perimeter of the camp, several buildings still remain, including the barracks for the Germans working at the camp, a canteen and a small zoo built for the Nazis' recreation. The original iron entrance gate is also still in place inscribed with the words Jedem Das Sein (roughly: You Get What You Deserve).

At Auschwitz, the famous Arbeit Macht Frei faced those who entered the main camp, but at Buchenwald, the message was eerily facing the prisoners on the inside of the camp and could only be read from the inside looking out.

What is most striking about Buchenwald today, however, is that it shows memory-in-the-making. At least a dozen memorial plaques and sculptures have been placed throughout the camp remembering the Jews, the Russians, the Gypsies, the children, the political prisoners and others who were murdered here.

The overall impression we had was of confusion and a lack of completion. Rather than a unified effort to record the horrors of the past, the groups who created the memorials each seemed to be groping to accurately and adequately preserve the memory of 50 years ago.

Unlike Auschwitz, which has been turned into a sterile museum of the Holocaust, at Buchenwald there is a sense of loss and failure to sum up and preserve the past. Part of this may be due to the fact that Buchenwald suffers from a lack of funds and staff, but whatever the reason, the somewhat confusing and chaotic state of memory-making at Buchenwald makes it an extremely challenging and disorienting place to visit.

The visitor has to work hard to picture what the camp looked like from the time of its construction in 1937 until its partial demolition in 1950. The site reflects many different layers in the camp's history which are not simple to sort out. For example, the present-day bookshop is housed in a building constructed during the Holocaust. Even the present size of the camp is not the same as it was during the Holocaust.

Many in our group experienced strong negative reactions when we told friends and family of our summer plans to visit Germany and Poland. We were warned that we would have a depressing summer. Or we faced shock and disgust at the notion that we would set foot in these countries.

We were not naive: many of us were children or grandchildren of Holocaust survivors and/or had relatives who were murdered in the Holocaust. Most of us were well-read on the subject of the Holocaust and had our own ambiguous feelings about travelling through Germany.

However, one thing I think we all learned from the trip was that there are no easy answers and no easy feelings to be found in Germany. In Buchenwald, especially, the complexity of history and memory is apparent.

To polarize the experience of moving from the sunshiny city of Weimar to the "bitter cold" chill of Buchenwald does not do justice to this complexity.

Jews in the Bard's time

Books

By Bernard Baskin

Shakespeare And The Jews by James Shapiro, Columbia University Press $44.95

For the most part, this impressively researched book is not about Shakespeare, but about how Jews were viewed and treated in the time of Queen Elizabeth I. Although Jews were expelled from England in 1290, at least several hundred remained in an overall population of about four million. Archival evidence from the period reveals that Tudor kings allowed small groups of them to remain as merchants, Hebrew scholars and physicians. They were not officially readmitted into the country until 1656.

What is astonishing about this book by a professor of English and comparative literature at Columbia University, is how obsessed the British were with Jews in their midst. In addition to acknowledged Jews, there was a confusing mixture of Jews, including conversos from Spain and Portugal, professional converts who posed as Jews and accepted Christianity, false Jews (Christians who masqueraded as Jews) and foreign Jews.

Diaries, sermons, political, social and religious tracts, and travel literature inveighed against them. They were accused of the desecration of the host used in the mass and the poisoning of wells. The charge of ritual murder had a long and special history in England and remained a popular notion even when there were few Jews in the country and no manifestation of the crime.

In the prevailing interest in Jews, even Queen Elizabeth was accused of being among their number. A privately published book came to the bizarre conclusion that she was a "secretly practising Jewess." The Queen's personal physician, Roderigo Lopez, suspected as a secret Jew, was tried and executed in 1594 for an alleged plot to poison her. An observer at the time wrote, "He went to his death strenuously affirming that he loved the Queen as well as he loved Jesus Christ, which, coming from a man of the Jewish profession, moved no small laughter among the standers-by." Some scholars believe that the unfortunate physician, undoubtedly innocent, was the prototype for Shakespeare's Shylock.

It is the author's basic thesis that Jews were regarded as a threat to British culture and homogeneity — at a time of great social and political change — largely because the British themselves were unsure of their own essential nature. The question of whether Jews could or could not be Englishmen in the fullest sense became an intricate and indirect way of arguing who and what an Englishman was.

The author emphasizes that although Jews were not fully tolerated or granted citizenship in early modern England, they were never subject to violent attacks, forced to convert, penned up in ghettos or burned in inquisitional fires, as they were elsewhere in Europe. (The infamous York Massacre took place long before in 1190.)

No English political or religious writer in this period came anywhere near the virulence of Martin Luther's diatribes, which called for the burning of synagogues, prayerbooks and Jewish homes.

"The fate of the Jews of England proved to be quite different than it was and would be in other European nations, both Protestant and Catholic."

In discussing The Merchant of Venice, the author asserts that much of the play's vitality can be attributed to the way in which it scrapes against a bedrock of beliefs about the racial, sexual and religious difference of others. "I can think of no other literary work that does so as unrelentingly ... and as honestly."

This is an innovative, scholarly work — six years in the making with over 50 pages of notes and a full bibliography. But it is accessible to the general reader interested in a many sided and absorbing subject.

Kosher Foodfest a success

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Food samples, arts and crafts, cooking demonstrations and Jewish books all combined to make the first Aish Hatorah Jewish Life and Kosher Foodfest a smashing success.

In fact, organizers and exhibitors alike called the two-day event held at the Promenade Mall in Thornhill fabulous.

Exhibitors included a scribe, Rabbi Shmuel Yosef Zirkind, who showed how t'fillin and mezuzot are made; caterers, stores, food distributors and producers; and information tables for Aish Hatorah and the Israel Aliyah Centre. Even The CJN was there.

Debbie Korn, of B & D Kosher Cuisine, who demonstrated how to make challah, carrot tzimmes and honey cake, called the exhibit "a wonderful experience."

"It's great for people to see how easy it is to make these foods for themselves. It helps enlighten the community about what Judaism is all about."

One of the most popular exhibits was the Your Jewish Name table, at which you could find out the meaning and significance of your Jewish name and have a printout about it.

Devorah Ohayon, who organized the project, said, "Exhibitors were thrilled and told me that they want to come back again. We are already planning for next year."

She added that she hopes that the number of exhibitors will double next time. "It's a fun day and educational — and it doesn't cost anything."

The show was part of Aish Hatorah's mandate "to encourage people to learn about Judaism, to develop a love and pride about Judaism and Israel," she said.

Rabbi Ephraim Shore, Aish Hatorah's executive director, echoed Ohayon's comment that the show was fabulous.

"It was a celebration of Jewish life. Thousands of Jewish people were out, having fun, even learning a bit, in a nice Jewish atmosphere.

"We are so lucky to be in a country that allows us to show our pride in being Jewish," he said.

UJA tours its beneficiaries

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — United Jewish Appeal (UJA) missions usually refer to tours to Israel, with scheduled visits to UJA beneficiaries. A recent half-day "mini-mission" took place in Toronto, however, to familiarize participants with the local beneficiaries of UJA dollars.

Mission organizers were Jewish Women's Federation and UJA Women's Campaign.

Last year's UJA campaign raised a total of $34 million, just under $4 million of which was raised by Women's Campaign. Of the total, a little over half is put to use in the local Jewish community by agencies affiliated with the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Representatives from the Board of Jewish Education (BJE), Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), the Bernard Betel Centre, the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) and the Kehilla Residential Project spoke about their respective agencies, some of which were included on the tour.

About $7.5 million is provided by the community for Jewish education, said Phil Alter, an executive member of the Board of Jewish Education (BJE). Although that amount represents about half the UJA money earmarked for Toronto, school deficits are rising. There is a $3 million gap between their collective allocation and recommended needs, Alter explained.

The BJE has an $800,000 operating budget, and allocates $6,700,000 as tuition subsidies to parents, which are calculated on the basis of financial need. Day school tuition fees average $7,000 a year per child at the elementary school level, Alter said.

Toronto has 16,554 children in its formal Jewish educational system, which includes about 40 supplementary schools serving over 6,500 children, as well as eight high schools and 17 full-day elementary schools representing a wide range of Jewish ideologies.

Jewish Family & Child Service deals with a variety of societal issues, among them child abuse, addiction and placing foster children.

Florence Weinberger, JF&CS executive assistant, spoke about the agency's financial assistance program as one example of where the UJA dollars go. An estimated 21,455 Jews live below the poverty line in Toronto, she said.

Like many other agencies, JF&CS had its budget reduced last year: about $600,000 was cut from its budget, the majority of the cut being from provincial and municipal funding. At the same time it faces increasing community needs.

"Bertha" is a typical JF&CS client. A recently divorced single mother, she called the agency reluctantly when she found herself unable to pay the rent on her apartment, Weinberger said. Bertha's marriage had broken up following the failure of the business she and her husband ran when they lived in a "nice little house in Thornhill."

The agency worked with Bertha to set a workable budget for her and is providing counselling and a monthly $294 supplement to allow her to "live in dignity within a modest budget."

Other aspects of JF&CS's financial assistance include extra help at Passover and a budget of $80,194 to send children to summer camp. "We believe in summer camp, and even a week at a day camp is a stretch [for some of our clients]. We feel if they want it, it's a normalizing activity, and it's also a respite for the mom."

JF&CS has 10 low-income housing units at the Kehilla Residental Project, two locations of which were seen on the mini-mission.

Kehilla was established in 1982 with seed money provided by UJA/Federation and is now self-sufficient. Partners in one of its buildings include Senior Care, Reena, the BJC, JF&CS and the Betel Centre.

The latter agency, a community centre for seniors, was also included in the mini-mission. The Betel Centre offers subsidized hot kosher lunches and a wide variety of classes and programs. It serves 411 individuals on a daily basis, said program director Norma Steiner.

The BJC is probably best known for its athletic facilities and summer day camp, both of which are subsidized for those members of the Jewish community who cannot afford the fees. Other funded programs include the Community Integration Program (CIP) for Russian immigrants, the annual Jewish book fair, nursery school and day care, said BJC executive director Deborah Pinsky.

רשמי מסע לארץ ישראל, קיץ 96:

בטורים הבאים אשתף אתכם ביומן מסע אישי, שמשקף כמובן דברים דרך עיני המסתכל. ראיתי שם הרבה דברים קשים והרבה דברים מעודדים, בערבוביה שיכולה לעשות קלקול קיבה למי שמערכת העיכול שלו עדינה. אז לדרך.

מושב בנגב, ספט' 96:

למרות שקוראים לחינוך בארץ "חינוך חינם", נדרשים ההורים לשלם אלפי שקלים לאורך השנה, כדי לממן הוצאות שונות, החל מספרי לימוד וכלה בחוגים. בבתי ספר רבים לוחצים על ההורים לשלם על ידי הקראת שמות הילדים שעדיין חייבים (יענו: שהילדים יתביישו וילכו הביתה ולחצו על ההורים). אבל יש בתי ספר שבהם נוקטים בשיטות יותר החלטיות כדי לחייב את ההורים לשלם: לא נותנים לילד "העבריין" ספרים ומחברות. אז הינה, ציטוט ישיר מ"ידיעות אחרונות" של 3 בספטמבר:

"ילד בן 12 מאחד מיישובי הנגב תלה את עצמו אתמול למוות בחדרו, לאחר שהוריו לא שילמו את אגרת החינוך לבית הספר, וחבריו לכיתה לעגו לו כי אין לו ספרים ומחברות. במכתב ההתאבדות שהותיר הילד מצאו ההורים המומים שאלה אחת שהופנתה אליהם: "למה לא שילמתם את אגרת החינוך". אה, וכדי שהזוועה תהיה מושלמת כדאי לציין שאחיו בן השבע של הילד הוא שמצאו תלוי. חשבתי לעצמי: בטח מה שהפריע לילד יותר מכל הוא זה שחבריו לעגו לו. אכזריותם של ילדים כלפי ילד חלש, עני או זנוח ידועה היטב. דרוש המון חינוך כדי ליצור סובלנות.

סובלנות או חינוך לסובלנות לא מצאתי בישראל של 96'. מצטער.

סיפור כד הכסף:

יום אחד הודיעו כותרות העיתונים בארץ שכד כסף עתיק שנתן הארכיבישוף היווני כמתנה לראש הממשלה המנוח רבין. הופיע במכירה פומבית. להגדיל את המבוכה, הודיעה דוברת מטעם גברת רבין כי הכד הוחזר לחנות בה נקנה והוחלף בעד שני מגשי כסף ש"היו דרושים להגשה בבית ראש הממשלה". איזה חוסר רגישות כלפי מיעוט שהחשיב מאוד את ראש הממשלה המנוח ואת ערכה האמיתי של מתנה עתיקה! לאה רבין התנהגה כאילו היתה זו בונבוניירה שמעבירים מיד ליד בפיליטון של אפרים קישון. התביישתי.

מהפיכת המנגו:

משהוא לראש השנה:

במקום תפילה, שיר יפה של לאה גולדברג, שענייננו ראש השנה:

"האמנם עוד יבואו ימים בשליחה ובחסד
ותלכי בשדה, ותלכי בו כהלך התם...
ונשמת את ריחו של התלם נשום ורגוע
וראית את השמש בראי השלולית הזהוב,
ופשוטים הדברים וחיים ומותר בם לנגוע,
ומותר, ומותר לאהוב..."

שתהיה שנה טובה.

Greater Toronto Area

Yiddish enjoying resurgence among youth

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A banner year for Yiddish education in Toronto is expected as a result of rising interest in the language and completion of the first training course for Yiddish teachers.

Three of the first graduates of this course, Sylvia Tishler, Faye Kellerstein and Ruth Gerlock, will teach children from junior kindergarten to Grade 8 Sunday mornings at Associated Hebrew Day School, 250 Finch Ave. W. The acting coordinator is Jeanette Stein.

It is hoped that 75 children will enrol in these free classes, where Yiddish reading, writing and conversation will be taught in a creative and stimulating atmosphere. Jewish holidays, culture, customs and history, art and music are a basic part of the program, which starts Sept. 22 and runs from 9.30 a.m. to noon.

The classes are sponsored, as are Yiddish courses for high school students and adults, by the Committee for Yiddish of UJA Federation in cooperation with the North York and York Boards of Education.

High school credit classes at Northview Heights Secondary School at Bathurst and Finch, for students in beginning and intermediate Yiddish, will prepare them for OAC credits. These are also free evening classes.

For adult beginners and for intermediate and advanced students, Yiddish conversation will be reinforced by the introduction of reading and writing to strengthen learning. Folk music and innovative learning games will be used.

Seniors taking the Yiddish classes pay a $6.50 registration fee. For other adults, the fee is $75 for a 10-week course.

For registration and other details call Sylvia Lustgarten, 635-2882, ext. 155.

A real Super Sunday

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Organizers of United Jewish Appeal's (UJA) recent Super Sunday hold the cool, rainy weather partly responsible for the day's take of a whopping $2 million in pledges.

"When the weather is unsettled, people are home and when they're home, they pledge," said Howard English, director of communications for Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

He also credits the 600 volunteers who made more than 6,000 phone calls to members of the Jewish community during the 12-hour day. "It was an outstanding volunteer turn-out. Every shift was overflowing, even those that are traditionally harder to fill."

The annual telethon, a prelude to UJA's Super Week which follows closely after the launch of its annual campaign, is one of Toronto's most successful one-day fundraising drives English said.

"The community is very receptive and there is a low bad debt ratio. Last year volunteers filled out 2,600 pledge cards on Super Sunday alone."

Volunteers who manned tables in the brightly decorated, balloon-filled room in the Lipa Green Centre came from all sectors of the community. A table of four men, all membners of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, estimated their total ages to be more than 100 years.

Children were also present, some as young as 6 years old collecting and sorting pledge cards, and others even making calls. To add to the festivities, radio station CFRB's Monica Desantis broadcast on-site, twice an hour for four hours.

"This is the first time we've had a radio station with us," said David Goldstein, chair of the 1997 UJA campaign.

Super Sunday co-chairs, the father and daughter team of Donald Rafelman and Debbi Stern turned out with their whole family including young children.

I BELIEVE

I BELIEVE that our community must continue to rise to the challenge of change.

Today, we are a stronger and more vibrant community, more varied, with diverse priorities and new and emerging needs. We have become a "community of communities."

That means we must think differently, respond differently, and act differently in order to reach out to all members of our community. What's required is a new level of leadership and involvement.

I believe that UJA Federation is the organization to bind our community together, to serve as the most effective catalyst for change.

Elaine Todres

By funding our community's institutions, UJA Federation enriches Jewish life in Toronto. It provides help and hope to those in need. It ensures access to a Jewish education and fosters Jewish culture. It enables us to speak out on the critical issues that affect Jews here, and abroad. It builds living bridges with Israel.

But for all we have, demand is not being met. The resources we need can only come from one place: Our community. Each and every one of us.

FOR OUR COMMUNITY. FOR ISRAEL.
FOR OUR CHILDREN. FOREVER.

UJA FEDERATION

UJA Campaign gains momentum

UJA Federation's 1997 campaign is riding high.

The campaign is 6% ahead of last year at this time boosted by a successful Super Sunday and Super Week.

Last week's Atarah and Lion of Judah Women's Campaign luncheon, hosted by Rose and Sam Reisman, was one of several key campaign events.

Over 100 top Women's Campaign donors heard from Alla Levy, Director General of Jewish Agency operations in the Former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, and Eva Ryterband, the president of a large automotive parts manufacturer, who received a fresh start 26 years ago, thanks to UJA Federation.

Ryterband recounted how she was helped twice by UJA Federation - once when she arrived as a young immigrant to Toronto and 10 years later, when her father was ill. She now wants to give something back to the community. "Without the Jewish community my family would have been destitute," she said.

According to Alla Levy, there are now 22 direct flights to Israel from the Former Soviet Union, funded by the UJA Federation supported Jewish Agency.

"We live in a big world," said Levy, "but in a small Jewish world where we must look after each other."

Francie Storm, who chairs the Lion of Judah division with Janice Langer and Bonnie Goldstein was enthusiastic about reaching new young contributors and thought Levy and Ryterband's speeches were "extremely powerful and inspirational."

"Today's program got to the root of what UJA Federation does for people in distress," added Janice Langer.

Rose Reisman, renowned cookbook author and business woman, applauded the "tremendous accomplishments of Women's Campaign volunteers."

Marilyn Gold, Maryka Weisz and Carole Herman Zucker are chairs of the Atarah division which together with Lion of Judah raised $1.9 million toward last year's campaign.

UJA FEDERATION ORGANIZES MONTREALERS REUNION

UJA Federation's Rockin' Montrealers Reunion promises to be as warm as the parking lot at the Orange Julep on a summer Sunday afternoon and as much fun as an evening at Yesterdays.

So if you're one of the 12,000 ex-Montrealers now living in Toronto, you won't want to miss a night of nostalgia and new friends on Saturday, November 2 at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

The reunion is part of UJA Federation's outreach to ex-Montrealers, designed to make the former Quebec residents feel at home in Canada's largest Jewish community.

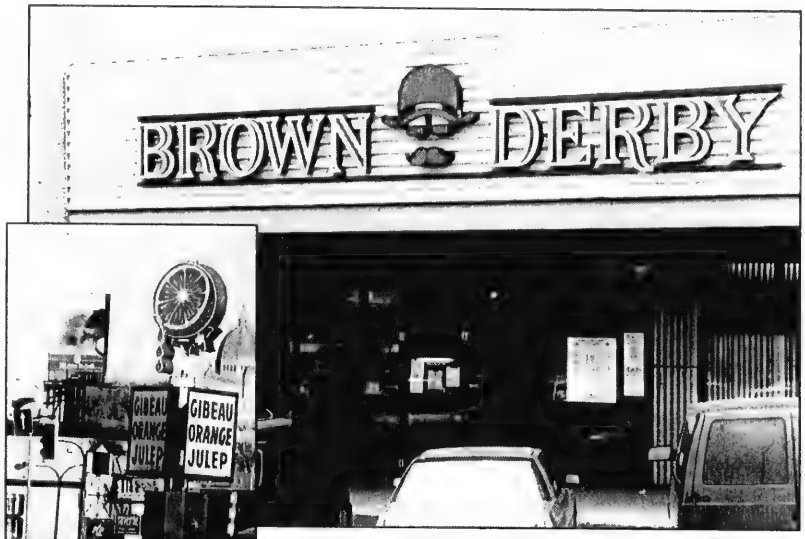
"My life has been enriched a great deal through my UJA Federation involvement," explains one-time Montrealer Judy Engel, who is chairing the event. After moving to Toronto 13 years ago, and knowing very few people, Judy called UJA Federation to find a link to the community.

"The reunion is all about making people aware of how UJA Federation can make them feel a part of the community," she adds.

Former Montrealer Loretta Levinson, and marketing coordinator for the event, says the reunion "will be a great opportunity for ex-Montrealers to see old friends and reminisce."

Participants will be treated to authentic Montreal-style deli, music from Mandell Entertainment and, promises Engel, "beaucoup de laughs." Ex-Montrealers can also sit in specially designated areas like Westmount, Snowdon, Cote Des Neiges and Hampstead as they take a trip down memory lane.

Tickets for the event are $36 in advance and $45 at the door. For more information, call Olga at (416) 635-2883 ext. 107.



The Brown Derby restaurant was a favorite hangout for Montrealers.

The Orange Julep provided a Montreal treat with a unique twist.

UJA funds business matchmaking

UJA Federation is helping to carve out new business links between Israel and the rest of the world.

Representatives of Business Network Israel BNI), a division of Operation Independence, jointly funded by the Jewish Agency and the Israeli government, recently met with members of UJA Federation's Economic Development Committee. BNI, Yael Varsano-Barzilay, Israel's Trade Commissioner to Canada and committee members explored joint venture possibilities between Israeli and Canadian companies.

BNI was created in 1992 to assist Israeli companies in expanding their business contacts in North America and to act as a resource for North American companies seeking partners in Israel.

The committee works with members of the community to enhance investment and economic activity in Israel which helps to absorb and employ thousands of new immigrants each year.

BNI's unique mission requires strong leadership and sharp business sense from its Managing Director who just happens to be the highest ranking female officer in the Israeli Army. Brigadier General (Res.) Amira Dotan not only revolutionized the way Israeli women participate in Israeli's Defence Force, she is now changing the way Israeli companies do business with the rest of the world.

Amira Dotan is Israel's first female General.

"We have a very practical, hands-on approach," explained Dotan, during her visit to UJA Federation. "BNI identifies viable Israeli companies and with the right research and contacts finds the best matches."

Dotan noted that the UJA Federation network of contacts is very useful in locating the right company.

"It's the best way to show our support for Israel," explained Economic Development Committee Vice Chair Beverley Abramson.

BNI and the Economic Development Committee have demonstrated success in matching companies from both medical imaging and vitamin supplement fields.

If you would like to become involved in the Economic Development Committee or find out more about BNI, contact Meir Klein at (416) 631-5739.

Getting young adults 'Out in Front'

Looking for a meaningful way to get more involved with your Jewish community? Here's how.

On Thursday, September 26, UJA Federation's Young Leadership Cabinet is holding an Out In Front information session for anyone, 25-40, who wants to explore volunteering.

Participants will be able to mingle with some of UJA Federation's most dynamic volunteers and hear how they help hundreds of people. "It's especially aimed at newcomers to Toronto who are looking for a Jewish connection," explains David Rashkovan who is co-chairing the evening with Jacqueline Valmont.

Both Rashkovan and Valmont are ex-Montrealers who turned to UJA Federation as a way of becoming more connected with their new community.

David Rashkovan

Jacqueline Valmont

"The great thing about UJA Federation," notes Rashkovan, "is that there's something for everyone."

Valmont, who won UJA Federation's 1995 Rookie of the Year award for her work with the Young Leadership Cabinet, says she volunteers because she "wants to give something back to the community that helped her when she needed it most."

"We hope to peak people's interest in volunteer work but we're also offering them a great way to meet people," adds Valmont.

Out in Front will take place on Thursday, September 26, 7:00 pm at The Game Room, 449 Walmer Road. To reserve a space call Lydia English at (416) 635-2883 ext. 172.

Kosher food importer fights federal labelling laws

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A box of crackers and a package of cereal bars were the prime exhibits as the case resumed in Quebec Court's criminal division against a kosher food importer who is using the constitutional guarantee of freedom of religion to defend himself against charges of not complying with federal labelling regulations.

Prosecutor Gilles Villeneuve entered as evidence the labels from Lieber's Bite-Size Snackers and Sun Valley Oat Bran Crunchy Snacks, products imported from the United States by Importations Cacheres Hahamovitch Inc. that do not meet Canadian law on nutritional claims and information regarding cholesterol, fat and sodium content.

Hahamovitch's defence is that requiring imported kosher food to comply with these laws infringes on the religious freedom of Jewish Canadians. Lawyer Paul Nadler says U.S. manufacturers and Canadian importers find it impractical to affix separate labels to most products because the Canadian market is too small.

The Crown contends that even if Justice Bernard Grenier deems the law to be an infringement, it is "reasonable" and can be "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society."

Villeneuve is trying to show that the greater public good, in this case, he maintains, the health of Canadians, both those at special risk and the general population, takes precedence.

There is no exemption for kosher foods from nutritional labelling, as there is for bilingual labelling, even for the Passover period.

Expert witness Margaret Cheney, chief of the nutritional evaluation division of Health and Welfare Canada, explained the development and rationale behind Canada's food labelling regulations and how they differ from those in the United States.

Canadian law, Cheney said, requires manufacturers to provide a detailed breakdown of the product's fat content by amount and by type, if it makes a claim of being low fat.

Objective is to protect consumers

In the case of the snack bars, for instance, whose front panel bears a claim they are low fat, there is no information whether that fat is saturated, polyunsaturated or monosaturated, Cheney said, as Canada requires.

The objective of the law, she said, is to protect the consumer by giving them "a full picture" of fat content.

In the case of sodium content, Canadian law requires that any product carrying a claim of being low sodium must not have more than 40 milligrams of sodium per 100 grams (except for meat, poultry, fish and cheddar cheese), Cheney said.

In the United States, however, a manufacturer can make a low-sodium claim if the product contains up to 140 mg per 50 grams.

The Lieber's crackers, which come from the United States and claim low sodium, have a much higher sodium content than is permitted in Canada, Villeneuve told the court.

Cheney testified that studies show the public is influenced by the labelling claims on food packaging and does read the nutritional panels.

Last year, the federal government laid 20 charges against Hahamovitch, under the Food and Drugs and Consumer Packaging and Labelling Acts. The charges were for lacking French on the labels, as well as nutritional and package size violations. Many of the illegally labelled products were seized from the shelves of at least seven major retailers in the summer of 1995.

In January, Grenier acquitted Hahamovitch of five of the 12 charges related to language. In his judgment, he said certain kosher foods may qualify as "specialty foods," as described in the Food and Drugs Act, and therefore should be exempt from the requirement of having French and English at any time of the year.

He did not, however, agree with Nadler that the bilingualism requirement is unconstitutional.

The Crown dropped charges of violation of packaging size standards because, Villeneuve said, it is expected that the Canadian and U.S. regulations will soon be harmonized under the North American Free Trade Agreement.

The defence is scheduled to present its expert witness when the case resumes Dec. 18.

Likud throwing Ottawa a few curves

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — Canada's relations with Israel have taken a strange turn in recent days.

The striped suit bunch at Foreign Affairs in Ottawa still don't know what to make of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's new Likud government.

And they appear divided among themselves over what line to take on what is happening in Israel and the Middle East.

Relations deteriorated a notch last month after Israeli authorities destroyed a children's playground that had been built four years ago in east Jerusalem with Canadian funds.

There were some Foreign Affairs officials who advised doing nothing, on the grounds that it was a "domestic" Israeli issue, and Canada should stay out of Israeli politics. Others urged making the strongest sort of public protest because they viewed the playground demolition as a "regrettable and provocative action" that had involved the waste of Canadian taxpayers' dollars.

In the end, the Canadian government sent a mild protest note and issued a short public statement, but went no further, deciding to stay out of the issue on the grounds it was up to Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat and Netanyahu.

A more serious internal issue at Foreign Affairs arose about the same time last month, when a former Canadian ambassador to Israel, Norman Spector, wrote a column which appeared in the Globe and Mail on Aug. 16, praising the new free trade deal between Israel and Canada.

Spector was Canada's ambassador to Israel from February 1992 to August 1995 and knows a great deal about trade relations with Israel.

He described how there had been opposition to the free trade deal for "political" reasons, some of it within Foreign Affairs.

He made it appear that some Foreign Affairs officials were at odds with the Prime Minister's Office and praised Prime Minister Jean Chretien for going ahead and ignoring them.

But it was the next line in his column that has infuriated his former colleagues on Sussex Drive.

Spector wrote: "Mr. Chretien's demonstration of independence upset, but did not vanquish the Arabists at what was now called Foreign Affairs."

Spector added that a group within Foreign Affairs has not "given up trying to derail the agreement with Israel."

These were serious charges indeed. If Spector's charges are true, it means a group of public servants — whom Spector did not name — are deliberately working against official government policy, while they continue to collect a government salary.

The term "Arabists" implies that their approach to Middle East issues may be somewhat less than impartial, to say the least.

Spector's former colleagues were incensed. How could one of their own, a former ambassador to boot, turn on them and vilify them with the epithet "Arabists," and accuse them of betraying their public service oath, of working against government policy while they continue to collect a federal pay cheque?

Some wanted the minister to demand a public apology from Spector. Others insisted Spector be forced to name names or issue a retraction. Some wanted him to lose his ambassador's pension.

Several recalled that when Spector had been the principal secretary to then prime minister Brian Mulroney, he had clashed with Foreign Affairs on a number of occasions.

Others recalled the Prime Minister's Office in those days had frequently meddled in Foreign Affairs business, and surmised the heavy hand of Spector had been behind it.

Great consternation ensued, but in the end, Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy issued no statement.

Foreign Affairs did absolutely nothing. No rebuke was issued and the whole thing died down as quickly as yesterday's news.

All of which could mean that Spector may have been closer to the mark than we figured.

But it didn't win Spector any friends at Foreign Affairs. Several have begun referring to Spector (who works for Imperial Tobacco in Montreal) as "that cigarette salesman from Montreal."

Don't expect Spector to be on too many "Arabist" guest lists at Foreign Affairs.

CJC rejects Bloc's request to denounce Galganov

Gauthier said he made the request, not specifically because Galganov is Jewish, but because Galganov has "presented himself as representing many people and many groups" and "we know this is not the case ... It is important that Quebecers know the reality: that he is not representing any organization when he speaks ... that he speaks for himself."

Gauthier said he wanted CJC to "clarify the situation ... that Galganov does not speak in their name." Although he did not get what he wanted, Gauthier said he was satisfied with the CJC response.

He said Galganov's statements have become "more and more difficult to accept" and specifically cited Galganov's calling the PQ government "bastards."

The meeting between CJC and Gauthier had been set several weeks in advance and was held at the initiative of Congress. That it fell the day before Galganov left for New York and Washington was coincidental. However, the agenda was supposed to have been to apprise the new BQ leader of issues of CJC concern, such as Nazi war criminals and multiculturalism.

Galganov called the PQ government "bastards" on an English-language radio station and apologized soon after. However, ardent nationalist Gilles Rheaume, leader of the Mouvement Pour la Souveraineté du Québec, turned the remark into one directed at all separatists and thus against the 60 per cent of French Quebecers who voted yes in the referendum.

Bernard was angry at Rheaume and at La Presse reporter Gilles Paquin for their focus on Galganov's long-ago JDL involvement.

Paquin's story appeared the day before Galganov left for New York. "The man who has set himself as the defender of anglophone rights and denounces furiously the 'ethnic nationalism' of Quebecers," it began, "went to school in the JDL, an outlawed racist movement in Israel."

The next day Paquin wrote a story on the JDL, headlined "The JDL: a violent movement in Montreal."

The theme was picked up by Rheaume who cited the "racist" JDL link as one reason he would not follow Galganov to New York.

Galganov, 46, has acknowledged that he was associated with the JDL as a youth in 1969-70 in Montreal and that its only attraction for him was its activism on behalf of Soviet Jewish emigration. He said he has had no association since then.

Jedwab calls La Presse reporter's actions 'despicable'

CJC Quebec region executive director Jack Jedwab was even stronger in his criticism of Paquin. He said Paquin has acted more like an "ultra-nationalist militant with an agenda" than a journalist, in his coverage of Galganov.

He said he found it "despicable" that Paquin had called some 20 Jewish "leaders" for an opinion on Galganov and tried to "transform this into a Jewish question."

Speaking to reporters last Friday, Gauthier said he had no regrets and felt no need to apologize over comments he made to CJC about Galganov.

New Edmonton congregation holds holiday services

EDMONTON — Members of the newly formed congregation Beth Tzedek held their first High Holy Day services this year, with Cantor Avinoam Sharon of Israel leading the prayers.

Founding Beth Tzedek members left Beth Shalom Congregation because, says a press release from Isobel Rodnunsky, a member of the interim board of the new shul, "politics were interfering with our focus on Jewish beliefs."

The congregation has been meeting since March for Shabbat morning services.

According to the press release, Beth Tzedek is an egalitarian participating congregation and conducts a Conservative service.

About 25 members attend the Shabbat services consistently, with as many as 42 people participating "and we look forward to a positive year. We are attempting to be an intimate shul. Everyone is welcome to participate. We are not in any way trying to take members from their own congregations but are looking to welcome those in our community who are unaffiliated," the press release says.

The Medicine Hat, Alta., Sons of Abraham Congregation has loaned a Torah to Beth Tzedek and Beth Israel Synagogue in Edmonton loaned prayer books and a Torah to help the congregation get started. Donations have been made for the purchase of prayer books.

Members of the interim board are: president, Saul Zalik; vice-president, Alan Rutkowski; gabbai Sol Estrin; secretary-treasurer, Harold Rodnunsky; directors Joe Benjamin, Pam Estrin, Isabella Easton, Helen Goldberg, Sara Zalik, Isabel Rodnunsky.

Students gather for 'inspiring' conference

By SIMONE JOSEPH

TORONTO — A dash of leadership training, a pinch of text study and lots of ruach were the ingredients that went into the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Hillel International Leaders Assembly.

More than 350 students from North America, Russia and Ukraine, including 25 Canadians, gathered for the assembly, held recently at Camp Moshava in Pennsylvania.

Inbal Erez, a fourth year student at the University of Toronto, said she found the assembly inspiring.

"I wasn't sure how involved I wanted to get [in the Jewish Student Union]. This gave me a boost and now I want to get involved. It got me all charged up and ready to start the year," she said.

The assembly brought together Jews from many different backgrounds. Michal Kaye, a history major from York University, was impressed by this demonstration of pluralism.

"We can learn from the conference that the Egalitarian, Reform, Conservative, Conservative and Orthodox can sit down and get along and respect each other. There was a definite interest to find out more about each other," she said.

Students were able to learn from one another by presenting their successful program ideas in a session called Student Program Shuk.

For example, the University of Pennsylvania presented their Hillel Chaverim — Buddy program, in which Jewish freshmen are paired up with senior level students. The University of North Florida presented their program of a mock Jewish wedding.

The students also attended various sessions to improve their skills, such as Create Your Own Web Page and Grant Writing: If I Were a Rich Student. They also engaged in text study, examining such topics as Judaism's view on abortion, and participated in a discussion of the Talmud as a guide for conflict resolution.

The students were also entertained by a Jewish a cappella group from Columbia University, called Pizmon.

As well, the Canadian students were part of the talent show, called Saturday Night Live. They performed a skit and sang a song called We are Canadian to the tune of We Will Rock You.

The Canadian students were able to schmooze with students from such schools as Princeton University, the University of Judaism and the Moscow Academy.

There were creative Jewish identity workshops, which ranged from painting and dancing to storytelling and meditation.

To Jill Binder, a computer science major from Carleton University, both dance and text study were an important part of the Assembly. "The Israeli dancing and text study strengthened my Judaism. The Israeli dancing was a sense of community and the text studies helped put Judaism into perspective," she said.

Of the Canadian participants, Eric Greenwood, a student from the Ohio State University, said, "Having Canadians here adds to the diversity. It was interesting to find out about Judaism in the Toronto/Montreal area."

Zac Kaye, executive director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, said that when he first came to the assembly three years ago, there was one Canadian student. Last year, there were 14 Canadian students and this year there were 25.

"It's forced Hillel to add issues that relate to campuses beyond the United States," Kaye said.

Ancient treasures now on display

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — From the Diaspora to Jerusalem, an exhibition of never before seen treasures excavated from family tombs in the Kidron Valley of Jerusalem will be on view at Hamilton's McMaster University until Nov. 6.

The excavation has been described as one of Israel's most important archeological discoveries of recent times.

The exhibit was prepared by the Israel Antiquities Authority. Its North American tour, the first showing anywhere, including Israel, is being coordinated by the Project Judaica Foundation of Washington, D.C., in conjunction with Jerusalem's 3,000th anniversary.

The Hamilton exhibit, the only one in Canada so far, is largely the result of the efforts of Dr. Alan Mendelson, associate professor of Hellenic Judaism in Alexandria in the department of religious studies, who arranged for it to be brought here from its only previous showing in Detroit.

The burial complex was unearthed during a road construction project in 1989. The site mentioned in the Gospel of Matthew as Akeldama (Field of Blood) was originally a plot of land purchased by Jewish high priests about the time of the death of Jesus, as a burial ground for foreigners. It has remained undisturbed for 1,500 years. The archeologist in charge of the project was Gideon Avni.

The exhibit includes ossuaries, gold jewelry, clay lamps and delicate glassware, some of which reportedly still contained perfumes.

While the exhibition is relatively small, explanatory panels provide fascinating information and historical background. There are also large scale photographs and a scale of an actual burial cave.

The exhibit is sponsored by McMaster University, the Herb and CeCe Schreiber Family Foundation, the Jewish Community Centre, the Jewish Federation, Hamilton-Wentworth & Area and the city of Hamilton.

The exhibit in the McMaster University Council Chambers, Gilmour Hall, Room 111, 1280 Main St. W., Hamilton, is open Monday through Wednesday, 11 a.m. to 6 p.m., Thursday and Sunday, 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. Admission is free.

Tours for groups of 10 or more can be arranged, by calling Mendelson at 905-525-9140, ext. 23389.

For more information, call Penny Hillier-Ward, at ext. 24607, or Andrea Farquar, public relations office, at ext. 24457.

Gore pledges solidarity with Netanyahu

By CYNTHIA MANN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK – In a message to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, U.S. Vice-President Al Gore pledged unswerving American solidarity with Israel that "transcends party and personality," and expressed confidence that the new government would continue the pursuit of peace.

Gore made his remarks recently during the 40th anniversary celebration of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

Netanyahu and U.S. vice-presidential nominee Jack Kemp also addressed the dinner, which drew 1,400 guests, including hosts of dignitaries.

Gore praised Netanyahu for meeting with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, and encouraged him to press ahead for peace.

It was clear that Gore was bent on demonstrating that, despite the heavy investment the administration had had in the peace process orchestrated by Netanyahu's predecessors, the United States is committed to honoring Israeli democracy and working with him.

"The balance Israel must strike in its aspirations for peace and its demands for security is a delicate balance," Gore said, "and ultimately it is the Israeli people who must decide how best to keep that balance.

"We are proud to walk by your side, Mr. Prime Minister, in our shared journey to peace and security," said the vice-president, whose speech was warm and familiar, filled with references to the Hebrew Bible, Jewish tradition and the High Holy Day season.

"Of course we have our differences, but friends have differences."

He also acknowledged that "we did not have the same relationship with the Likud leadership" when it was in opposition and that Netanyahu "did not see things just as his predecessors did."

But he reminded the audience that the late Likud prime minister Menachem Begin "seized peace" with Egypt as soon as he had "the opportunity to safely do so," and said he was confident Israel would "seek peace with all its neighbors, cautiously, but energetically."

Gore said President Bill Clinton had moved boldly to respond to recent Iraqi aggression against the Kurds in the northern part of the country, in part because "Iraq's fondest wish would be to harm Israel."

He said the United States acted to show Iraqi President Saddam Hussein that he could not "act with impunity."

For his part, Netanyahu reiterated Israel's commitment to the "quest for a secure peace."

In his remarks, he talked of the approaching 50th anniversary of the State of Israel and the need to declare a worldwide "Jewish renaissance," a "rededication and rebirth."

Israel is "not just a state," he said, but an entity intended to preserve the common destiny of the Jewish people.

Kemp attempted in his address to answer recent criticism over an interview in which he praised the self-help philosophy of Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan.

Kemp said he stands by his long record against anti-Semitism, racism and bigotry and called on Farrakhan to renounce anti-Semitism.

"Racial, religious and ethnic reconciliation is the highest moral cause of this nation on the eve of the 21st century," said Kemp, whose speech received a tepid response.

Mostly, however, he focused on foreign policy and the importance of preserving the alliance between Israel and the United States.

Praising Netanyahu's economic privatization efforts, Kemp said he and presidential candidate Bob Dole would move the U.S. economy in the same direction of "greater growth and freedom."

Russian premier condemns recent attacks on synagogues

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW– Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin has condemned the recent bombings of two synagogues in Russia.

The premier's statement was included in his Rosh Hashanah message to the country's Jewish community.

"I'm using this opportunity to express my indignation about recent terrorist explosions at the synagogues in Moscow and Yaroslavl," Chernomyrdin said.

He called synagogues Russia's "national sacred places" and said that "an end should be put" to their desecration.

Chernomyrdin's statement was the first public comment by a Russian official on the April bombing of the synagogue in Yaroslavl and the attack on the recently reopened Lubavitch synagogue in Moscow.

The attacks caused no injuries, but both buildings were seriously damaged.

No one has claimed responsibility for either bombing.

Jewish leaders hailed the premier's message.

"I'm happy that we received such a response from the prime minister," said Pinchas Goldschmidt, chief rabbi of Moscow.

The albatross around Israel's neck

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Almost five months have elapsed since Israel called off Operation Grapes of Wrath, yet Lebanon remains an albatross around Israel's neck.

Mideast Analysis

The 16-day military campaign launched by Israel against Lebanon last April, in response to the shelling of the Galilee by Hezbollah, did not change anything on the ground.

The American-sponsored truce ending the fighting enjoined Israel and Hezbollah from firing on each other's civilians and established a monitoring committee to observe compliance of the ceasefire.

But otherwise, the status quo in Israel's self-declared security zone remains basically unaffected by the political manoeuvering. Nineteen Israeli soldiers have been killed in the security zone this year, 10 of them since Operation Grapes of Wrath.

"There is a war going on there with battles every day," the Israeli chief of staff, Gen. Amnon Shahak, declared in no uncertain terms last month.

Hezbollah has adhered to a pledge not to rocket Israeli settlements in the Galilee. Yet, in all other respects, the truce is barely functioning. Both sides have dug in for the long haul, despite Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's recent demarche to calm the waters in Lebanon.

Israel's defence minister, Yitzhak Mordechai, has said that the Israeli army will remain in the security zone for as long as it is necessary to protect its northern communities. For his part, Hezbollah's spiritual leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, has proclaimed that Hezbollah will not abandon its struggle to oust Israel from Lebanon.

Backed by Syria and Iran, Hezbollah is amassing a vast arsenal of weapons and has come into possession of Katyusha batteries capable of hitting Israeli towns as far away as Karmiel and Acre.

The Israeli army's top brass, notably Shahak and Gen. Amiram Levine, the commander of Israel's northern district, have accused Syria — which maintains a garrison of about 35,000 troops in Lebanon — of deliberately allowing Hezbollah free rein in southern Lebanon.

The facts speak for themselves. Iranian cargo planes, laden with military supplies bound for Hezbollah, regularly land at Damascus airport. And Syria is doing scarcely anything to sever Hezbollah's logistical lines, which pass through Syrian checkpoints in Lebanon's Bekaa Valley.

Netanyahu has called on Syria to curb Hezbollah so that Israel can consider a withdrawal from Lebanon in an orderly fashion.

Last month, Netanyahu formalized the proposal under the rubric of the Lebanon First plan. Israel would pull out of the security zone, and in exchange, Hezbollah would be disarmed, the Lebanese army would be deployed to the border with Israel and Israel's Christian allies in southern Lebanon (namely the leadership of the South Lebanon Army) would be protected.

Netanyahu regards Lebanon First as a starting point for confidence-building measures between itself and Syria. The Syrians, as expected, have rejected Netanyahu's scheme. To Damascus, Lebanon First is little more than a clever ploy by the Israeli government to extricate itself from the Lebanese quagmire painlessly, to block a withdrawal from the Golan Heights, to decouple Lebanon from the Golan Heights and to undermine Syria's leading position in Lebanon.

Netanyahu, having been rebuffed by Syria, now insists that he is prepared to discuss not only Lebanon, but "all outstanding issues," including the Golan. Netanyahu, however, is inflexible on the disposition of the Golan. At the White House last week, Netanyahu informed President Bill Clinton that his government is loath to relinquish it under the United Nations' land-for-peace formula.

The Syrians have no interest in defusing tensions in Lebanon unless Israel theoretically agrees to give up the Golan (in return, of course, for a peace treaty with all the trimmings).

In the meantime, the cauldron in southern Lebanon simmers.

Netanyahu and Mordechai have implied that Israel will hit any target in Lebanon, including Syrian bases, if the security situation worsens. And Levine has let it be known that, in the war against Hezbollah, Israel should respond with greater force than in the recent past.

Is there a solution? Avigdor Kahalani — Israel's minister of internal security — recently suggested that the security zone is of questionable military value, that Israel should find a way to leave it and that an international force should replace Israeli soldiers there. Kahalani, a retired general, said that the current system of border fences could keep out infiltrators.

Kahalani may be right. It is certainly in Israel's national interest to seriously consider a phased withdrawal from Lebanon, which has taken a heavy toll in Israeli lives and resources for the past 25 years. But will Syria cooperate?

IDF monitoring unusual Syrian troop movements

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The IDF continues to monitor Syrian troop deployments in Lebanon and Syria, but there were no significant changes over last weekend, sources said.

The IDF has adjusted its intelligence gathering along the Lebanese and Syrian borders, but sources stressed that there were no abrupt movements.

Syrian troops have been redeploying in Lebanon for the past few weeks and have pulled out of landmark positions in and around Beirut.

Syria has about 30,000 troops in Lebanon.

Most of the redeployed troops have taken up positions in the mountain range on the Syrian border where the Syrian army has SAM-7 anti-aircraft missiles and anti-aircraft gun batteries installed, Lebanese security sources, quoted by Reuters, said.

They said that Beirut newspaper reports that 20,000 Syrian soldiers had already moved from Beirut, the central Lebanese mountains and other regions toward the Syrian border were exaggerated.

The Syrian troop movements started last month when the troops evacuated a number of positions in the mountains of central Lebanon in what Lebanese security sources announced was a defensive redeployment after apparent Israeli threats to attack Syrian forces in Lebanon.

Despite the pullouts, armed Syrian troops are still stationed in the Lebanese capital.

These Syrian troops are highly visible in some areas, including Shi'ite Muslim suburbs that are a stronghold of the pro-Iranian Hezbollah. IDF intelligence analysts do not believe the redeployment indicates a dramatic change in Syrian assessment or that it is preparing an attack. Still, Israeli forces in the north have adjusted to the moves and some units may have been reinforced.

There were reports that planes believed to be Israeli flew over south Lebanon, Beirut and Baalbek in eastern Lebanon last week. No air raids were reported.

Reuters reported that half a dozen trucks piled high with Syrian soldiers, bedding and furniture moved north along the seafront Corniche promenade in west Beirut. A large tent encampment, one of the most visible symbols of Syria's military presence in Beirut since 1987, was gone, Reuters said, as well as two other camps.

In the past few days, Syrian troops have abandoned a number of other sites, including their positions near the presidential palace at Baabda. But despite the pullouts, Syrian troops are still stationed in Beirut and its suburbs, and are highly visible in some areas.

Syrian army engineers are also reported to be working "feverishly" to build combat positions in the demilitarized zone of the Golan Heights, in contravention of the 1974 disengagement agreement brokered by former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger following the Yom Kippur War.

This is the first time that Syria has flouted the agreement and UNDOF, which monitors the zone, is preparing a report on the activities of the Syrian engineers for UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali and members of the Security Council.

Tensions between Israel and Syria have increased over the past month with reports that Syria had tested long-range Scud missiles, facilitated the delivery of long-range Katyusha rockets to Hezbollah and moved troops in Lebanon closer to Mount Hermon.

Syria rejects Netanyahu's plan

By Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM – U.S. Middle East peace process coordinator Dennis Ross was due to arrive in Egypt Monday night on the first leg of a regional tour to discuss progress in the peace process.

He will visit Jerusalem, but it is still unclear, according to an official in the Prime Minister's Office, whether Ross will also travel to Damascus.

Syria reiterated its rejection of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's proposal to resume peace talks, saying it did not contain a commitment to trading land for peace.

The official Syrian newspaper al-Thawra also criticized the United States for supporting the Israeli proposal and urged a united Arab stand to face the "dangerous alternatives resulting from the failure of Netanyahu's plan.

"To continue misleading the world and America he [Netanyahu] tried in his latest visit to use new ways to propose the idea...saying that there is a draft plan to resume the talks," al-Thawra said.

Washington announced earlier in the week that Israel and the United States had new proposals to restart the Syrian-Israeli peace negotiations.

Rabin's murderer, two others guilty of plotting assassination

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – An Israeli court has convicted Yigal Amir, the assassin of Yitzhak Rabin, of conspiring to kill the prime minister and of planning attacks on Palestinians.

Amir, 26, is already serving a life sentence for the murder of the prime minister.

The court also found Amir's brother, Hagai, and a friend, Dror Adani, guilty last week of the charges of plotting to kill the premier and attack Palestinians.

A three-judge panel in the Tel Aviv District Court also found the three guilty on weapons charges and of conspiring to set up an illegal underground organization.

The three will be sentenced Oct. 3. Legal sources said they could each face more than 25 years in prison.

The lengthy verdict, read out by Judge Amnon Strashnov, countered Yigal Amir's contention that he acted alone when carrying out the assassination.

Strashnov accepted prosecution evidence that Hagai Amir and Adani actively proposed methods of killing Rabin.

He termed them "full partners" in the slaying.

Hagai Amir and Adani each denied that they had conspired to kill Rabin.

Hagai Amir, 28, a weapons expert who prosecutors said made the hollow-point bullets used to kill Rabin, said he had heard of his brother's plans, but never thought he would actually carry out the assassination.

Adani, 28, said he had visited the Amir home in hopes of romancing the Amirs' sister and had gotten drawn into conversations about how to assassinate the prime minister.

But the judges did not accept their denials.

CJF/UJA proposal approved

By CYNTHIA MANN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK – The executive committee of the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF) in the United States has decided unanimously to move forward with a plan to join the CJF with the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) there.

The decision came during the CJF's quarterly meeting Sept. 8 to 10 in Chicago.

The two bodies are slated to begin negotiating the shape of the partnership, which could be a complicated process.

They will look for shared office space, "merge back office operations wherever possible" and "look at redeployment of personnel where duplication appears to exist," said Dr. Conrad Giles, the CJF's president-designate.

A draft document on the partnership has been in circulation for some time, outlining a proposed joint board and executive committee for the two bodies and two separate chief executive officers. But such matters are being left to the two organizations to decide.

The CJF is the umbrella organization for local federations which run an annual joint campaign with the UJA that raises about $720 million (US).

Each federation decides how much of its share to keep at home to meet local needs, and funnels the rest to the UJA for distribution to Israel and elsewhere overseas.

The new partnership idea replaced an earlier plan to merge the two entities along with the United Israel Appeal, which funnels campaign money to the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Search for missing soldier called off

By Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM – Police have decided not to renew the search for missing soldier Sharon Edri of Moshav Zanoah, who has been missing since Sept. 10.

However, police will continue to collect intelligence information in an attempt to locate him.

Police sources admitted that there is a growing fear for Edri's life.

The searches were stopped last Friday afternoon. During Rosh Hashanah, Beit Shemesh police operated a field unit that attempted to collect information, but no new clues were found.

The police said that since extensive searches were conducted between Zanoah, near Beit Shemesh, and the Tzrifin army base, where he was last seen, it was decided not to renew the searches.

Seattle caps day school costs

By DEBORAH CYMROT
The Washington Jewish Week

SEATTLE – Last week when students at Seattle's Jewish high school headed back to class, their parents were smiling and not just because summer vacation was over. The students are beneficiaries of a pilot program designed to make day school education truly affordable; parents know that until their children graduate, tuition per pupil will never top $3,000 (US).

The program might not have come to fruition had Seattle businessman Sam Israel not made a shrewd investment decision more than a half-century ago. In the late 1930s and '40s, Israel began buying up real estate in downtown Seattle and around the city, a move that made him a very wealthy man.

With no wife and no heirs but an abiding interest in the Jewish community, Israel set up a will deeding almost all of his estate to a private philanthropic foundation. Two years ago Israel died, and the Samis Foundation, named for the benefactor, had to decide how to use the money.

One project Samis undertook was the tuition cap program, sure to get the notice of day school educators around the country. The board looked at a study done by the Wexner Foundation on how best to transmit Jewish heritage and its conclusion that post-bar/bat mitzvah Jewish day school education was a key factor. The question, then, was how to get more students into Jewish high schools.

As the foundation board understood it, the Wexner study had shown that while many Jewish parents expressed a number of reservations about day school education, the resistance was at least in part financial. Asked if they would pay $7,000, $6,000, $5,000 or $4,000 for a year's tuition at day school, the majority of respondents said no. But at $3,000 they were willing to overlook their monetary reservations.

Samis decided to apply the Wexner findings. Seattle has two day schools that go up to eighth grade and one Jewish school for grades nine through 12, Northwest Yeshiva High School.

Last year, tuition at Northwest Yeshiva stood at $7,150. (The total cost for educating a student for one year was $12,000.)

The Samis guaranteed tuition cap provides an immediate savings of $4,150 per student compared with last year.

David Balint, former treasurer and board member of the school and still chair of its building fund, said that without any publicity, just word of mouth, Northwest Yeshiva enrolment jumped from about 40 to 75 students from last year to this year.

Based on the school's graduates over the past 20 years, Balint feels optimistic that increasing the number of Jewish high school students will pay off for the Jewish people. Of the school's crop of 120 graduates, all went on to higher Jewish education, either at yeshivot or universities.

In two decades, only one former student married a non-Jew.

Balint said that the school is open both to those who come from day school backgrounds and those who do not. It has had great success with Russian immigrants who entered with no formal Judaic background, he said.

The Samis program is not without challenges. As currently configured, the tuition cap covers only students now at the school, not those who enrol in the future.

But Balint expects Samis to evaluate the program well before next year's student sign-up. The foundation, he said, has the money to provide permanent funding for the tuition guarantee if the program succeeds.

Maintaining parental support for the continued growth and development of the school cannot be taken for granted. "We're hoping that people don't get lazy," Balint said. Samis replaces tuition money that parents were paying, but it doesn't provide additional money to Northwest Yeshiva.

Fundraising will still play a part in the school's future if it is to flourish.

The school recently completed a $1.1 million campaign to pay off its building. With larger enrolment comes a need for expanded facilities. The school will ask parents to give voluntary donations to equal what they paid as tuition. No one knows yet whether tuition caps can boost enrolment in Jewish high schools without decreasing initiatives for independent fundraising.

And no one really knows whether students whose parents have had to sacrifice a great deal to pay for day-school education represent a more committed group than those who may be attracted by the tuition caps, and whether the benefits of a Jewish high-school education noted in the Wexner study will hold true for the newcomers.

But the opportunity to test the concept of truly affordable day-school tuition with all its challenges is one that Elliot Prager, headmaster of the Charles E. Smith Jewish Day School in Rockville, Md., would love to have. "If we could just get that foundation in Washington," he said.

But there's the rub. Samis is in Washington. Washington state.

A practical step to peace with security

By ZALMAN SHOVAL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Opinion

Whether the timing of Benjamin Netanyahu's recent meeting with Yasser Arafat had anything to do with the prime minister's trip to America is irrelevant. That such a meeting had to occur sooner or later was clear all along – among other reasons because the Oslo agreements, inherited by Israel's new government from its predecessor, left the premier little choice.

In theory, the government had two options. One was to declare that it was not formally committed to the implementation of Oslo (but this, though not ruled out by international law, was hardly feasible taking political and diplomatic realities into account).

The second option for the government was to see itself as bound by the agreements in principle, but to implement them very differently and avoid the headlong rush that characterized the previous government's dealings with the Palestinians.

An important point: If in the future, Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority (PA) were again to commit or even to tolerate large-scale violations of their undertakings under the agreements, as they have clearly done in the past, the Netanyahu government would be fully justified in responding in an appropriate fashion, diplomatically and militarily.

The debate over whether, at the time, the peace process with the Palestinians could have been advanced without resuscitating Arafat is now largely academic; but if, after the meeting at Erez, some Labor and Meretz leaders declared that Netanyahu owed them an apology, well, surely the shoe is on the other foot.

If any apology is called for, those same leaders should be reminded that not so long ago, they were crying that Netanyahu would "kill" the peace process altogether, that he would create a disastrous crisis in our relationship with the United States, that he did not know how to talk to our Arab interlocutors.

In fact, Netanyahu is doing exactly what he set out to do: to continue the peace process, fulfil the previous government's legal obligations, and – if need be – meet with Arafat. After all, most of the electorate wanted the peace train to move forward; they just wanted a safer driver.

Having said all that, the meeting with Arafat – and one may assume there will be others – should not be read as a rehabilitation of Arafat's past. No handshake can erase that. Nor should anyone delude himself that Arafat or any of his colleagues have changed their attitude toward Israel and Zionism.

With some exceptions, all the negative features are unfortunately still very much in evidence: violence and brutality, a lack of democracy, the neglect of basic human rights, a disregard of treaties and agreements and, last but not least, the tendency of some leaders in the region to change positions and policies almost overnight.

Today's really cogent questions do not deal with the past, but with what Israel and the Palestinians can hope to achieve now.

Netanyahu made it plain to Arafat that the Palestinians stand a very good chance of attaining most of their realistic aspirations – "realistic" being the key word – but not everything they thought they would get from the previous government.

Their alternative? To squander everything they've already achieved and risk losing out altogether.

For instance, solving the Hebron conundrum is important, but the issue will have to be settled in a way that addresses Israel's security and historical considerations without diminishing Palestinian self-administration.

But there is a challenge that is much more important. Will the Palestinians be able to govern themselves as part of a de jure peace treaty or as part of an agreed de facto situation, acknowledging Israel's overall prerogative in matters of security?

Some people termed the Netanyahu-Arafat meeting a historic event. It would be much closer to the truth to describe it as a practical step towards achieving peace with security – just as Netanyahu has indicated all along.

Show examines mixed relationship

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Etti and Farouk are divided by religion, culture and politics.

Does love conquer all? Maybe in some countries, but evidently not in Israel.

A Love Divided, scheduled to be broadcast on Vision TV on Sept. 24 at 9 p.m., examines the doomed relationship of a mixed Israeli couple.

Etti, an Ashkenazi Jew, and Farouk, an Israeli Muslim Arab, love each other but will not tie the knot because civil marriage does not exist in Israel.

They live together in an apartment in Jerusalem, suspended in something of a cultural twilight zone. Neither Etti nor Farouk wish to convert and thus face an insoluble problem in a country which frowns upon mixed marriage. What are they to do?

A Love Divided grapples with their dilemma intelligently and empathetically. At the end of this sensitive film, we're left with the impression that couples like Etti and Farouk are fated to suffer so long as political and religious tensions beset Israel.

The animus against such unions seems strong. Etti is physically assaulted by a neighbor who dislikes Arabs, while Farouk's family makes it abundantly clear that he should break off his ties with Etti and seek out a Muslim woman.

Etti is a social worker and Farouk — a graduate of the Hebrew University who speaks Hebrew fluently — is a teacher and a broadcaster. Etti was taught that Arabs are bad, dirty and untrustworthy. It is unclear where she learned this. Farouk was brought up in a small village, but one assumes that he was also raised on a diet of ethnic stereotypes.

When they met, at a rally protesting Israel's treatment of Israeli Arabs and its occupation of the territories, Etti and Farouk were no longer bound by such narrow thinking.

Etti and Farouk are on the same political wavelength. But in Israel, this isn't enough. Etti's sister, a liberal, professes to be shocked by their liaison. Etti's mother, a Polish Jew, eventually concludes that Farouk is "a very nice person." However, Farouk's parents reject Etti.

Their bond is severely tested when Farouk loses his jobs and decides to return to his village. As Etti won't join him, Farouk decides not to "renew" their relationship.

Etti and Farouk, though, are still in love, and Etti expresses a sincere desire to have children with Farouk. But forces beyond their control have torn them apart.

A Love Divided not only traces the dissolution of a conjugal arrangement, but documents the deep divisions in Israeli society. By any yardstick, this is a documentary well worth watching.

Israel Enters Euro Bond Market

Israel's first entry into the Eurobonds market with $1,030 million was officially launched last week when the Finance Ministry and seven leading underwriters signed the final agreement.

After the Jerusalem ceremony, the primary underwriter, Merrill Lynch, said all the partners were confident that Israel's economy was now well capable of sustaining this type of venture.

"A slowdown [in growth] from six percent to four percent in real terms is hardly a recession," said the company's chair of Global Financial Institutions John Heimann.

The three-year deal is "yet another illustration of the very significant steps in advancing Israel's economy over the last six to seven years," said Finance Minister Dan Meridor. "Israel is now selling its economy and others are buying."

Meridor took the opportunity to criticize media and economic experts, who suggested Israel's world credit rating would be dropped below its A ranking.

The reaffirmation of Israel's A status coupled with the signing ceremony show the strength of the Israeli economy, he said.

Israel's credit rating was reapproved last week in the international markets A and A3 by credit rating companies Moodys Investors Service and Standard and Poors.

The announcement came two days before the government issues on the Eurobonds were underwritten.

The ratings are crucial in Israel's attempt to raise funds abroad. The decisions by Moodys and Standard and Poors were welcomed as "a vote of confidence" by the Finance Ministry, which hopes to sell up to $340 million worth of bonds by the year's end, the first part of a three-year bid to raise over $1 billion.

While the ratings reapproval is likely to be looked on favorably, the report could well focus on the economic slowdown, which some economists and politicians are calling the early signs of a recession.

The seasonally adjusted figure averaged 6.4 percent, down 0.2 percent on the previous three months.

The number of unemployed actively seeking work in any given four weeks between April and June stood at 128,500, a slight fall on the same period last year.

The number of jobless women reached 7.2 percent, a 0.4 percent drop on the previous quarter, and one percent lower than in the last three months of 1995.

The number of people working, excluding those in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza and foreign workers, totalled 2,025,000, a 3.4 percent increase (67,000) on the same period last year.

Wolf Krakowski, Paul Brodie & Valerie Tryon, Beth Anne Cole

Wolf Krakowski:
Transmigrations

Filmmaker Wolf Krakowski, who spent six months filming the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Project and who directed Vilna, a Yiddish docu-music video, branches out creatively with Transmigrations (Gilgul) a CD of 12 Yiddish songs.

Krakowski, who sings and plays rhythm guitar on this CD, has put together a diverse collection of traditional Yiddish folksongs, show tunes and ghetto lider and mixed them with the contem-porary sounds borrowed from rock, blues, reggae and honkey tonk. It's definately not klezmer although a klezmer feel permeates the album.

It's this mix of contemporary music with the tradition of Yiddish sound which makes this CD unique. Older lovers of Yiddish songs might be able to get their teenagers to slip this into their CD player instead of the latest Pearl Jam album. It won't convert them but it will make them listen a second time.

Some of the songs included in this collection are traditional folksongs like the rather upbeat, rocking version of Tsen Brider (Ten Brothers); the bluesy, mournful Varshe (Warsaw), written by Holocaust survivor Benzion Witler and Shabes, Shabes, which pulsates to a sizzling, rootsy reggae beat. Her Nor, Du Sheyn Meydele (Listen, Pretty Girl) is one of my favorites. Krakowski is joined by Yiddish diva Fraidy Katz in this upbeat male/female dialogue where the woman vows to undergo every hardship to be with her man. (OK it's not politically correct, but should be taken in context like anything else.)

Most of the songs on Transmigrations, like Her Nor, Du Sheyn Meydele, have a swinging, shaking feel to them and Krakowski's unique, deep voice adds a rich, bluesy touch. It's not quite rock and roll but I like it.

Included in the CD liner notes is an English translation to the songs' lyrics for those of us not exactly altsveisers in the ways of Yiddish.

Distributed by Kame'a Media, it is available in Toronto at HMV, Negev, Ma Tov and Israel's. Elsewhere in Canada you can order it from Kame'a Media, P.O. Box 73548 509, St. Clair Ave. W. Toronto, M6C 1C0.

Beth Anne Cole
Song Under The Stair

After many years of haunting record stores and music libraries, and hounding old-time arrangers and musicians, Canadian Jewish actor Beth Anne cole finally found a cupboard full of Marta Schlammes' music in a Manhattan apartment in 1995.

That changed Cole's life because the content of the Vienna-born Schlamme's Yiddish folk songs inspired her, in her own words, to reconnect to her own Jewish culture.

One result was a recent highly successful one woman concert of Yiddish songs in Toronto; another was a just-issued cassette, Song Under The Stair, with a CD recording to follow soon.

Cole's trademark is her lush dramatic interpretation of such well-known favorites as*Tumba, Tumba; Teire Malke; Freylach; Mit a Nodl;* and Voshe Vistu? as well as songs relating to the Holocaust like Dremlien Feygl oyf di Tsvaygn.

The difference between this collection of Yiddish songs and many others is that Cole is an actor whose interpretation are grounded in her art, uncovering layers of meaning in the words.

Cole starts rehearsals soon for her roles (she's playing more than one) in the musical Jane Eyre, the world premiere of which is at the Royal Alex in Toronto, Nov.20.

Beth Anne Cole

"It will be a relief for me to be in Jane Eyre, to have someone else make the decisions and to have the companionship of other actors, unlike the time I spend arranging my own concerts," she said.

Meanwhile she is on the way to Wiarton and the Bruce Peninsula for a brief beach and hiking holiday before plunging into Jane Eyre.

Song Under The Stair ($12) is available in Toronto from Lasting Impressions, 243 Wilmington Ave., and The Music Chamber, 217 Danforth Ave.

Paul Brodie and Valerie Tryon
The Music of Srul Irving Glick

For the sensitive listener, The Music of Srul Irving Glick, a new CD recorded by saxophonist Paul Brodie and pianist Valerie Tryon, is as pleasing to the eyes as it is to the ears.

The CD delivers four expressive compositions by Glick, one of Canada's most prolific composers. As rendered by the deeply soulful artistry of musicians Brodie and Tryon, the music evokes a series of rich visual images.

At certain moments, for example, one sees a gazelle bounding through a verdant woods. At others, the lush and sensuous interplay of sax and piano become a beautiful woman dancing in tall windswept grass.

The works have an overridingly Jewish flavor. One doesn't need to read the extensive liner notes to know that Glick, composer-in-residence at Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue and holder of the Order of Canada, has introduced and enlarged upon themes from horahs, cantorial music and other Judaic music.

In the Sonata for Saxophone and Piano "Adio," for example, which the composer wrote in 1992 on the 500th anniversary of the expulsion of the Jews from Spain, he used (as the liner notes explain) bits of 16th-century Ladino melodies. Likewise, for the Sonata for Soprano Saxophone and Piano – originally written for oboe and subtitled the "Oboe Sonata" – he borrowed a melodic fragment from the ancient cantillation of the Lamentations of Jeremiah.

Glick is an energetic and emotional painter with a largely romantic palette. The Lament movement within the Suite Hebraique #4, for instance, delivers a bittersweet melancholia that tries to break your heart. Elsewhere, the melancholia is colored by piano riffs that are reminiscent of Rachmaninoff, Chopin and even Satie, all as poignant and temporal as windblown autumn leaves.

Still, the composer's gloom in the Sonata for Soprano Saxophone & Piano doesn't seem nearly as tragic as the subject matter. The work was written partly as a memorial prayer for the ninth day of the Hebrew month of Av, when both Temples of Jerusalem were destroyed (in 586 BCE and 70CE). Although compelling, Glick's lyrical sadness does not seem nearly deep or portentious enough to describe these epic calamities of the Hebrew people.

It is said that music is the most articulate of the arts, yet this music, even as it beguiles, has a certain air of mystery and may leave you wondering at times what it is saying.

Brodie's sax is always in magnificent voice, but can be unrelenting after more than an hour of listening. This recording is a large chocolate sundae, so rich and concentrated that it may dull your senses if you attempt to enjoy the whole thing in one sitting.

The Music of Srul Irving Glick is Brodie's 47th CD. The Muskoka-area musician and his wife, fabric artist Rima Brodie, are planning a trip to Russia this December. Paul is scheduled to perform as a soloist with the St. Petersburg Orchestra and to lecture on art in Moscow, while Rima plans to exhibit her art in Moscow with the assistance of the Canadian Embassy.

To order the CD, phone 416-762-3907.

Actress enjoys role of Ruby Rosenholtz

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Debra Kirsherbaum is approaching her title role in The Slow Eviction of Ruby Rosenholtz with relish. For one thing, Ruby, though beset with problems, fights back, and in Kirshenbaum's view, this is what the Women's Theatre Festival is all about.

Ruby, a woman in her 30s needing daily medication, who could be Jewish, is being manipulated by the power-hungry manager of the seedy Toronto hotel where she lives. But in The Slow Eviction of Ruby Rosenholtz, playing at Tarragon Extra Space Sept. 25 to 29, she holds her own ground with the help of her "family," two friends who have also been rejected by "normal" society.

Despite its subject matter, Kirshenbaum says the play is "extremely funny" and rolls through 90 minutes at a rapid clip.

Debra Kirshenbaum

Eviction is one of 10 plays at the festival under the umbrella title of The Gathering, Sept. 16 to 29, with the first five running at Factory Studio Cafe and the rest at the Tarragon Extra Space. The purpose of The Gathering is to offer a theatrical kaleidoscope of women's lives across Canada. (534-2827)

Kirshenbaum is no stranger to off-the-wall roles like Ruby. "I play the gamut from a prim, British woman of the elite set to a zany character like Ruby," she says.

Toronto audiences will remember her gutsy performances at the Tarragon of Theresa, the mentally handicapped young mother in The Crackwalker and as the tough head waitress in Michel Tremblay's play, Counter Service.

"All I ask is that a play expresses something of a humanitarian spirit. I've turned down roles in plays that deal only with the dark side of life and contain nothing uplifting."

Though she won't reveal the ending, Kirshenbaum says Eviction fits this definition to a T.

Her fellow actors in the play directed by Dean Gilmour are Jackie Burroughs, Greg Kramer and Duncan Ollerenshaw with set and costume design by Minda Johnson.

Ketubah company linked to the Net

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The ketubah or Jewish marriage contract is receiving more attention among newlyweds these days.

Michael Shapiro, who has a masters degree in business administration from the University of Toronto, combined his business acumen with his love of Judaism and created Ketubah Ketubah, a company that specializes in high quality, limited edition prints of original ketubot designed by some of the world's most accomplished artists.

In 1994, Shapiro, a marketing executive, took a year off to study history, politics, Hebrew and Arabic at the Hebrew University. He then went on to study at the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem.

He says that while in Israel, he decided he wanted to start an innovative business that would be both economically viable and consistent with his personal values.

At the time, he met Israeli artist Ardyn Halter and the idea for Ketubah Ketubah began to germinate. Soon Shapiro added other artists, including former Torontonians now living in Israel, Howard Fox, Laya Crust and Ted Labow.

The traditional to contemporary ketubot are printed using fine inks and papers and each one is hand signed and numbered by the artist. Many of the artists will create custom pieces. The limited edition prints range from $125 to $395.

Michael Shapiro

Recently, Shapiro was approached for bar and bat mitzvah certificates, baby naming documents, home blessings and special occasion pieces.

Shapiro says the key to Ketubah Ketubah's international service is its Internet gallery. Located at [http://www.ketubah.com/-ketubah], the gallery contains a selection of ketubot by Canadian, American and Israeli artists.

"At the click of a button," says Shapiro, "surfers can view each ketubah in color on their computer screens, complete with a description of the artwork and background on the artist."

Eye on Arts

Pascin's Passion

Born in Bulgaria as Julius Mordecai Pincas, the celebrated painter and draughtsman known as Jules Pascin (1885-1930) studied art in Budapest, Vienna and Munich, then went to Paris, where he was swept up with the major artistic movements of the period, ranging from post- impressionism to cubism to surrealism.

Pascin is best known for his images of languid, serene young women lounging in graceful poses. A selection of his works are on view at Gallery One, 121 Scollard St., Toronto, until Oct. 16. 416-929-3103.

The Little Foxes: It was Lillian Hellman's friend and fellow writer Dorothy Parker who suggested that Hellman name her 1934 play The Little Foxes after a line from The Song of Solomon: "Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines: for our vines have tender grapes."

At first glance, the play is a pessimistic indictment of capitalist society and all heartless persons who value material gain above human love. But it is also an exacting portrait of a particular American family, the Hubbards, in their quest for enormous wealth.

The excellent production of this play currently at Stratford's Festival Theatre is proof enough that it is more than a propagandistic period piece. Instead, it is a wrenching family drama that shows what happens to ordinary people when motivated by greed.

The play casts light on the ideological mindset of many Americans, particularly Jewish Americans, at a time when they were increasingly turning to socialism and communism as an antidote to the seeming inhumanity of capitalism.

Hellman, the longtime companion of crime-fiction writer Dashiell Hammett, was blacklisted in Hollywood in the 1940s for refusing to cooperate with the House Un-American Activities Committee.

The Little Foxes, starring William Hutt and Martha Henry, is in performance until Oct. 13.

Ashkenaz News: Last month's fundraising guided tours of the Judaica Gallery of the Royal Ontario Museum raised approximately $10,000 for the Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture.

New Gallery: The Gallery of Klim Art Publishers, founded by Raya and Daniel Gluzberg, is opening this month with an exhibition of paintings, etchings, serigraphs and sculptures by four Canadian artists: Joe Fleming, Louise Houde, May Marx and Serge Firer.

The Gluzbergs first opened an art gallery in Israel in 1977, and soon thereafter started an art publishing company. They emigrated to Canada in 1989 and moved their publishing business and showroom to 1238 Centre St., Thornhill.

Meet the artists at the new gallery, Sept. 21 from noon to 5 p.m. 207 Queen's Quay W., second floor. 416-203-9162.

In Brief: Stage Centre Productions presents Blithe Spirit, by Noel Coward, Sept. 29 to Oct. 5 at Fairview Library Theatre, North York. 416-299-5557.

• Life Dynamics, a showing of recent oil paintings by Vivian Felsen, is currently on display at the Azalea Bar and Grill, 1158 Yonge St., Toronto. 416-968-0710.

• Marci Wilson, recently wowed an audience at the downtown club Graffitti's, singing three sets of classic jazz tunes to the able accompaniment of guitarist Harris Mark Lusher. They are both talents worth watching.

Proper diet is essential for diabetics

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Diabetics should not look upon diet in a negative way, but as a proper form of eating, a specialist told a packed meeting of the Jewish diabetes chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association at Shaarei Shomayim Synogue recently.

"Diet is not just weight watching or a reaction to diabetes," said Dr. Marsha Werb, a Sunnybrook Health Science Centre endocrinologist. She advised that patients should eat small meals frequently, stay away from loading up on too much sugar early in the day and check blood sugar levels between meals to find out where the problem is.

"It is true that some diabetics have a craving for food. It is actually a type of hunger from eating badly in the first place," said Werb.

Diabetics should write down their blood sugar and cholesterol levels and give them to their doctors, she advised.

"The more information you bring to us, the more we can do for you. When you have chronic complications such as eyes and kidneys, it is hard to reverse the situation. It's possible to fix something when it's on the way, but hard to fix something that's broken."

Diabetics should stop smoking and cut down on their alcohol intake, especially beer. "I have major concerns about alcohol," she said, relating the story of one of her patients who had four beers after a football game, didn't have supper and hit an overpass on the 401. "Fortunately no one was hurt, but he lost his driving licence for a year."

To a questioner who said her 17-year-old diabetic student son was told by his doctor he could have one beer, Werb replied: "With students, one beer tends to stretch into three or four."

She expressed concern about a cut in health service budgets, declaring: "If this government doesn't screw everything up, you'll still have your diabetes education specialists and eye and kidney specialists."

Every one of her own patients is referred to a nutrition specialist, she said.

Doctors are beginning to look more carefully at the idea that in some patients, diet and exercise may be the answer, rather than increasing the levels of insulin.

"I'm known as a slasher [of insulin intake]," she said. "Sometimes it's possible to cut insulin amounts in half. A small percentage of Type 2 diabetics can come off insulin but you have to be good as gold [about your diet]."

She said blood pressure medications can cause problems for diabetics, and secondary diabetes may result from taking prednisone, but most will return to normal if taken off prednisone.

Alan Marks, chapter president, chaired the meeting.

Arthritis is a real pain

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "It's going to rain tomorrow — my arthritis is killing me." We've all heard that dire warning from elderly relatives. Most of us have said it ourselves on occasion.

Arthritis is Canada's most prevalent chronic disease. According to the Arthritis Society, it affects nearly four million Canadians of all ages and both sexes.

There is no cure and if left untreated, it can lead to intense, recurring pain and even permanent disability.

Arthritis is an umbrella term for more than 100 different conditions affecting the joints and connective tissues. The most common are osteoarthritis, rheumatoid arthritis, gout and ankylosing spondylitis. Other conditions include lupus, scleroderma and juvenile arthritis.

There are also related conditions, such as bursitis and tendinitis, which affect the structures supporting the joint.

While all these problems are lumped under the term "arthritis," they are each unique. Osteoarthritis, for instance, the most common form of arthritis, is caused by the wearing away of cartilage covering the ends of the bones, usually in the major weight-bearing joints of the hip, knee or spine.

Rheumatoid arthritis, which unually appears between the ages of 25 and 50, causes inflammation in the lining of the joints, and sometimes as well in other internal organs.

Dr. Wayne Potashner, a North York rheumatologist, is an honorary co-chair of this year's Arthritis Month, sponsored by the Arthritis Society, along with Dr. Edward Keystone of Wellesley Hospital and Dr. Arthur Bookman of the Toronto Hospital.

Potashner told The CJN that there is no known certain cause for arthritis, although it is felt that genetics may be implicated.

"Trauma, infection or previous surgeries may also play a role," he said.

Arthritis now is not necessarily a precurser to deformity and disability, he said. "There are many therapies now that can ease suffering and put you into remission."

That's particularly true, he said, for younger patients, and for rheumatoid and psoriatic arthritis, and lupus.

For lupus, for instance, one form of arthritis in which the immune system is affected, it is possible to "alter the immune system so that symptoms can be ameliorated."

Physiothery and occupational therapy, as well as different forms of carefully chosen exercises, can be very helpful, he said. Pills, drugs or injections may help, or, in worse cases, surgical repair or replacement of joints can be successful.

While Potashner says it's very rare to see serious deformities that one used to associate with arthritis, he emphasised that arthritis is "a serious systemic illness, which should be treated or supervised by specialists."

If you believe you're developing arthritis, Potashner said, "don't panic. We never want someone to diagnose oneself on his own."

Ask your family doctor, he said. "A good family doctor is skilled in the diagnosis of such illnesses and is very qualified to treat them." They will also refer a person to a specialist, if they believe that that will help.

All allied health profesionals have a role to play in the treatment of arthritis, Potashner said, including chiropractors, massage therapists, podiatrists, physio- and occupational therapists and orthopedic surgeons and physicians.

The key, he said, is to begin with a family doctor whom you can trust and confide in.

There is serious research being done into arthritis, much of it funded by the Arthritis Society. Studies include immune modulatory treatment, genetics, including DNA research.

"I expect we are only a very short time from seeing great breakthroughs," Potashner said.

Planned book to record Mount Sinai's history

TORONTO — In 1998, Mount Sinai Hospital, with the financial support of W. Bernard Herman and family, plans to launch a book recording the history of the hospital, in celebration of its 75th anniversary year.

Toronto-based freelance writer Lesley Marrus Barsky is currently researching the development of the hospital from its beginnings on Yorkville Avenue in 1923 to the present day.

"The history of Mount Sinai Hospital in many ways parallels the growth of the Jewish community in Toronto," says Gerald Turner, Mount Sinai Hospital's president emeritus and chair of the 75th anniversary publication advisory board.

"We are calling on our friends within the Jewish community for assistance in gathering photographs that could help to trace the growth and development of Mount Sinai Hospital and the Jewish community.

"Specifically, if you have any photographs of the Mount Sinai Hospital site on Yorkville Avenue (1923 to 1953) and/or the New Mount Sinai Hospital at 550 University Ave. taken in the mid-1950s, that you would like to share for possible inclusion in the Mount Sinai Hospital 75th anniversary book, contact Barsky at 416-586-3150. All materials will be returned."

Brewers catcher balances baseball, Torah studies

By MICHAEL GELBWASSER
The Jewish Advocate

BOSTON — While his teammates sleep late before night games, Milwaukee Brewers catcher Jesse Levis often gets up early — to look for a morning minyan.

Levis is a Conservative Jew, one of five active Jewish major league ballplayers. Before a Brewers/Red Sox game at Fenway Park recently, he told youngsters from the South Area Maccabi Club of Stoughton that balancing baseball and Torah studies is difficult but not impossible.

"It's like any other profession," Levis said. "If you're good enough and you work hard at it, you can be successful."

The 28-year-old Philadelphia native was raised in a Conservative household and attended Hebrew school. Baseball games and practices were scheduled around the practice of religion.

"I got it done," Levis said. "I had a bar mitzvah and I respected all the holidays. I had plenty of time for school, baseball and friends."

After playing little league and American Legion ball as a kid, Levis played three years at the University of North Carolina. He also played in the Cape Cod League during the summer. The Phillies thought Levis good enough to select in the 36th round of the June 1986 amateur draft. Although the Phillies were Levis' favorite team, he didn't sign with them. Instead, he signed with the Cleveland Indians after they chose him in the fourth round of the June '89 draft.

Levis made his major league debut on April 24, 1992. He spent parts of the 1992-95 seasons with the Indians, mostly as a back-up catcher. Levis travelled with the team during the '95 post-season as an alternate, warming up pitchers in the bullpen. Entering this season, he'd hit .240 lifetime with one home run and 10 runs batted in.

During the '95 off-season, Cleveland traded Levis to Milwaukee for minor league pitchers Scott and Jared Camp. Through July 2, Levis had a .240 average with no homers, 18 hits and 10 ribbies in 75 at bats for the Brewers. One of his season highlights came on June 9 at Fenway when he hit a pinch-hit single off Red Sox reliever Heathcliff Slocumb in the ninth inning of the Brewers' 11-8 victory.

"It's a dream come true," Levis said of his career in the majors. "When I was 5 years old, I remember going to a Phillies game and saying 'Wow! I want to be a major leaguer.' "

He also attends a minyan when possible. Although he doesn't keep kosher, Levis asked the youngsters from the Maccabi club if they knew of any local kosher restaurants.

"He's nice," said Jacob Kriegel, 9. "He's not afraid to say he's Jewish."

One youngster asked Levis about anti-Semitism in the majors. He said he'd heard "jokes and stuff about being cheap" but nothing malicious.

"There's not a whole lot of anti-Semitism, but some peopole may talk behind your back," Levis said.

The Maccabi youngsters had mixed feelings about Levis' decisions to play on Jewish holidays. They wondered if his loyalty to Judaism should exceed his loyalty to his team.

"I think he should try to stay home on the holidays," said Janna Fox, 10. "But if the team really needs him ..."

"He's letting down the Jewish tradition if he doesn't observe the holidays," Kriegel said. "But he's letting his team down if he doesn't play."

The other major leaguers who are reportedly Jewish are pitchers Mike Milchin of the Minnesota Twins (2-1 with a 3.60 ERA in 15 innings played over 17 games), Jose Bautista of the San Francisco Giants (1-0 with a 2.63 ERA in 27 innings pitched over 14 games), catcher Brad Ausmus of the San Diege Padres (.141 with one homer and 13 RBIs) and Shawn Green of the Toronto Blue Jays (.288).

Maccabi sports festival proves huge success

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A first-time "Maccabi Summer Sports Festival" earlier this summer in the Laurentians involving about 400 campers from six local Jewish camps proved so successful that plans are to expand the idea to other parts of Canada, one of its organizers said.

"You saw it in their faces. There were lots of kids, lots of talent. Every Maccabi region should be doing do it," said a beaming Harry Hus, who thought of the concept and co-chaired the festival.

In Hus's memory, the all-day sports event marked the first occasion local Jewish camps have gotten together en masse in the Laurentians.

The festival, at Camp B'nai Brith (CBB), was coordinated and co-chaired by Tina Ornstein, of Camp Kinneret-Biluim (who recently returned to Israel) and by CBB officials. It was run under the joint sponsorship of Maccabi Canada (Quebec) and the Jewish Camp Council, a group of Jewish camps under the umbrella of the Jewish Education Council (JEC).

Also involved in the event were the Y, the Israel Youth Program Centre and the Council on Jewish Continuity and Identity.

But for Hus, it was the campers, clad in special color-coded T-shirts with the festival logo, who more than anyone else made the festival a success beyond even the most optimistic expectations.

Not only that, though. The festival — using the theme of the United Colors of Israel — was also highlighted by sports clinics, a balloon launch, Olympics-style opening, closing and torch-lighting ceremonies, as well as by a police-escorted Y Wolf Pack torch relay run from the synagogue in Ste-Agathe to CBB, led by the venerable Wolf Bronet.

Coming from the two above-mentioned camps and four others — Y Country Camp (YCC), Camp Massad and two day camps, the francophone Camp Benyamin and the Y's Friendly Faces Day Camp — the campers, ranging from the ages of 11 to 16 and each assigned a color to designate a region of Israel, spent the day competing in a variety of sports, including softball, basketball, soccer, tennis and newcomball.

Hus, however, said the value of the day was not measured by the medallions handed out, It was gauged instead, he said, by the added sense of Jewish identity, cameraderie and heightened general interest in sports the festival inspired.

"It is out of things like this, that you get athletes," observed Hus. "They got to know something about Judaism, interaction and the Maccabi movement."

Indeed, Hus said plans are for this first festival to be an annual one, part of a recent effort by Maccabi Canada in Quebec to make a key age group aware of and active in the organization and athletic activities in general.

Last year Hus, who is also Maccabi Canada's sports chair for Quebec, conceived of a winter sports festival, which he said will be repeated in February and feature Jewish participation both from Jewish and non-Jewish schools.

Just how important the day was reflected by who else was there.

They included Israeli consul general Daniel Gal, honorary chair Heleena Wiltzer, as well as Maccabi Canada stalwarts like Joey Richman (who lit the festival flame), president Roy Salomon, Bob, Abe and Mary Luxenberg, and Gordie Schwartz.

Even Ste-Agathe House of Israel Rabbi Emanuel Carlebach, who at one point exchanged a tallit for a T-shirt, was there.

With the festival taking place exactly a year before the actual Maccabiah Games in Israel, Hus was especially delighted to see some kids who looked like potential prospects for future games.

"Whenever you have these many kids together, there's always talent," he said.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

Last spring, I graduated from university and I still haven't found a job! I'm ready to work hard at any job I get, but I don't know what type of job I want. What should I do?

Dear Reader,

What type of degree did you get? If your degree is a bachelor of science in biology, can you work as a biologist or do you need more education? How about if you have a degree in English, can you work as an English teacher? For technical questions like this, check with the career centre at your college or university.

When you think about work, think about the kind of assignments you did in school. Which ones did you enjoy and why? What types of jobs would require you to do those types of assignments? If you are not sure, check with your former professors or go to your local library and look for books in the career section. Many professions have associations with career advice and job assistance for new graduates. Look for the names of these groups in the phone book and on the Internet.

If you are still unsure about what you would like to do, consider viewing video tapes about different work opportunities. These tapes offer realistic views of many different types of jobs and are available at libraries, school guidance centres and local career centres.

Once you think you know what you want to do, consider interviewing people who work in those types of jobs. Call up people who are suggested to you by your family, your school, your friends, or just cold-call someone who sounds like they do interesting work. Ask for 10 minutes to ask about their job. When you get in the door, find out about a typical day, what type of stress is associated with the job. Question how to go about finding a job in that field and ask about the current job market. This person may be able to suggest who is hiring at your level or other opportunities for work similar to his.

Once you have narrowed your area of interest, start scouring newspapers, Internet addresses and federal employment centres for job opportunities. Check out the student employment centre at your college or university. Look through your class notes for names of companies who are working on projects that interest you and call them as well.

Finally, develop a resume that stresses skills, not a history of part-time jobs. Show it to someone you respect who works in your area of interest. Speak to the people who are going to get your resume to increase the chance it will be noticed. If you can send it out to 10 interested people each day, you should be on the job before Chanukah.

Observing the Sabbath in the land of the Midnight Sun

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

HELSINKI — On summer evenings in Finland, the orange-red globe of the sun seems to linger for hours above the horizon, not setting until the wee hours.

In this Land of Midnight Sun, the sky is still a bit light, even at midnight, and the sun reappears by 3 a.m. and is soon shining strongly.

"In the north, a religious Jew would have a problem (observing Shabbat) because there the sun doesn't set at all," said Dan Kantor, executive secretary of the Finnish Jewish community.

Starting in June and lasting throughout the summer, evening services in Helsinki's Adath Israel Synagogue are conducted at a fixed time. However, the havdalah ceremony which ends the Sabbath is sometimes conducted much later – "at the latest, one-thirty in the morning," Kantor said.

"The important thing is to celebrate Sabbath, not to watch the clock. If you keep the Sabbath for 26 or 27 hours, I think it's enough."

The ancestors of Finland's present 1,500-strong community probably dealt with the religious ramifications of keeping the Sabbath in northern latitudes in their former homeland. The first Jews to reach Finland arrived from Russia about 1809, the year Finland became part of the Russian empire after 700 years of Swedish domination.

To protect their new territory, the Russians sent army troops "and among those soldiers were so-called cantonists," Kantor said. "They were young Jewish boys, no more than 12 or 13 years, taken by force into the army and forced to serve up to 25 years."

After their service, many of the cantonists had lost all contact with Russia and opted to stay in Finland, Kantor said. Around 1830, some went back to Russia to find Jewish wives and returned to settle in Finland.

Finland's first rabbi, Naftali Amsterdam, was appointed in 1856.

Foreign visitors regularly drop by Helsinki's only synagogue, which dates from 1906, and many inspect the glass display case that holds a historic wreath. Then-Finnish president Marshall C.G. Mannerheim gave the wreath to the Jewish community in 1944, in commemoration of the many Jewish soldiers killed in the Finnish army in the war.

"This is how Mannerheim showed the outside world the attitude of the Finnish government towards the Jewish question," Kantor said. "By coming to the synagogue and giving this wreath, he really declared that the Jews were equal citizens. In a way it was a bold thing to do."

In the early part of World War II, Finland joined Nazi Germany in fighting Russia and many Jewish soldiers found themselves in the unenviable position of fighting side by side with the Germans.

"The Germans wanted the Finns to hand over the Jews, but the Finns wouldn't," Kantor said. "The only Jews deported from Finland to the camps were eight Austrian refugees, and even that was without the permission of the government."

The Adath Israel synagogue is located at Malminkatu 26, Helsinki. For information about travelling to Finland, contact the Finnish Tourist Board, Suite 604, 1200 Bay St. Toronto, Ont. M5R 2A5. Phone 416-964-9159

Anxiety levels rise on Golan

By MARK A. HELLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

When military movements produce tension and anxiety levels rise – as they do almost every year around Yom Kippur – people are in no mood to think about theories of international relations. Nevertheless, the uncertainty surrounding Israel's relations with Syria underscores the danger of acting on instinct and neglecting more systematic thought.

Analysis

For the last half-century the conceptual legacy of World War II has dominated thinking about war and peace.

Three occurrences embody that legacy: the publication of Mein Kampf, Munich and Pearl Harbor. They have become metaphors for the disastrous consequences of failing to recognize, resist and prepare to fight the intentions of aggressive autocrats.

Having learned the lessons of this failure, policymakers and analysts have resolved never to repeat the mistakes of complacency and appeasement that led to war.

Instead, they have fashioned strategies of deterrence calculated to warn potential aggressors that their intentions are known, are taken seriously and will be resisted, and that the capacity to defeat and punish them is available and will be used.

And to eliminate any possible doubt about their credibility, these warnings are often accompanied by actions, including weapons tests, troop movements and other shows of force.

The impact of World War II was so vivid and overwhelming that its lessons provided an almost unchallenged framework for fashioning Western security policy during the Cold War. As for Israel, the trauma of the Holocaust and the seeming parallel between its security

'We're fighting for national unity'

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Don't call Howard Galganov an "English rights activist."

"That rankles me. Rights are rights. We're fighting for rights and national unity and they're inextricably connected," he said, during a two-hour interview at his home in St. Lazare.

Unbowed by the apparent lack of American interest in his trip to Wall Street, Galganov is busily planning his next major event that he is confident will attract the media, not only in the United States, but worldwide.

Exclusive

On Nov. 22, he will open a store called Presque Pure Laine in "central Montreal" and attempt to provoke a showdown with the government over the language laws, on the eve of the Parti Quebecois (PQ) national convention. ("I don't want to reveal the location and get firebombed.") He will post two signs of equal size and content in English and French.

He will then wait to be charged and go to jail for refusing to pay the fine or he will sue to have the language law quashed.

In mid-October, he also hopes to lead a demonstration against the drug insurance plan, which he sees as yet another cost of the separatist threat.

Galganov founded the Quebec Political Action Committee (QPAC) , not to "lead [anglophone] public opinion, but to reflect it."

When he speaks of "we" – as he usually does – he means himself. The group has no members as such and till now has been financed by him. Galganov says he's personal-

PM Urges Restraint

JERUSALEM – Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu urged Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert to act with restraint when dealing with demolitions in east Jerusalem because of the sensitivity to the subject shown by the Palestinians and the international community, government sources said.

The request was largely aimed at avoiding a showdown over the alleged illegal construction recently discovered next to Al-Aksa Mosque.

A New Year's Surprise

JERUSALEM – Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat called Leah Rabin to wish her well on Rosh Hashanah, the Hebrew daily Ma'ariv reported.

"He wished me a happy New Year," Rabin told the newspaper. "And he said it in Hebrew."

Rabin said Arafat called her husband, Yitzhak Rabin,"a hero of peace," and said he missed him.

Palestinian Workers

JERUSALEM – The number of Palestinians allowed to work in Israel is being increased from 32,000 to 50,000, Finance Minister Dan Meridor said last week.

The decision was announced following the first meeting of the Joint Economic Council since the May elections, with the Palestinian team being led by PA Economy, Trade and Industry Minister Maher Masri.

NEW YORK – The first street in the United States to be named after beloved Yiddish author Shalom Aleichem was recently dedicated.

The naming of Shalom Aleichem Place in New York coincided with the 80th anniversary of his death in 1916.

New Year's Rite

KIEV, Ukraine – Following a tradition that dates back to the beginning of the last century, some 8,000 chassidic pilgrims made their way from the United States and Israel to the small Ukrainian town of Uman, a city of about 50,000 halfway between Kiev and Odessato, to visit the grave of Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav at Rosh Hashanah.

Jews Seeking Restitution

KIEV, Ukraine – The Ukrainian Jewish community is quietly laying the groundwork for the restitution of communal properties that were confiscated by the state during the Communist era.

During the past three years, Ukraine's Committee for the Preservation of Jewish Heritage, or KSEN, has been gathering archival documentation to prove communal ownership of the properties.

Anti-Semite Convicted

GENEVA – The leader of a group known as the Universal Church has been found guilty of publishing an anti-Semitic brochure claiming that Jewish greed caused World War II.

Reimers Peters was fined $4,000 by a Swiss court and ordered to pay $6,800 in legal costs after being found guilty of breaching a law that makes it a crime to discriminate against ethnic groups or incite racial hatred.

BARLEV RESPONDS TO EGYPT'S THREATS

Israel's Chief of Staff Lieut.-Gen. Haim Barlev, responding to Egyptian threats to renew the war of attrition, has warned that Israel could, if it were "the correct solution," carry the battle across the ceasefire lines into Egyptian territory.

Israel would not be compelled to do this, as in the first moments of the Six Day War in 1967, Barlev said, but "we can do it and there may be situations in which it is right to do it."

RESTRAINT URGED DURING KOSYGIN'S VISIT

Canada's External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp has suggested that restraint be used during Russian Premier Kosygin's visit to Canada in October by community groups demonstrating on behalf of the right of Soviet Jews to emigrate.

"Such sensitive issues can be broached only in an atmosphere of mutual confidence and trust if we are to avoid the risk of provoking a hostile reaction on the part of the Soviet authorities," Sharp said. Outdoor demonstrations, silent marches, a legal seminar and mass rallies are among the events planned by Jewish organizations.

Jewish groups welcome U.S. voice on Quebec

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish organizations say they were pleased to see a U.S. congressional committee monitoring international compliance with the Helsinki Final Act voice concerns over the rights of Jews and other minorities in Quebec seen as being violated.

"If anything can get the [Quebec] government to fall in line, it's pressure from the States," said Robert Libman, B'nai Brith's Quebec director.

"The American committee has raised legitimate questions," said Max Bernard, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec regions (CJC-Q) community relations committee.

"The Quebec government needs to concern itself very much with the concerns of the the international community with respect to such possible violations."

Their comments came after a report that the U.S. Congress' Helsinki committee sent letters of concern over possible violations of Jewish and other minority rights in Quebec to Canadian Ambassador Raymond Chretien last April and July.

The first letter worried about rights being compromised in the wake of the matzahgate affair and asked that the Canadian government inform Quebec about its obligations under the accord.

The second letter wondered how the Quebec government's proposed resurrection of the "language police" under Bill 40 could affect the kosher for Passover issue.

The April letter said last Passover's crackdown on kosher products "had the effect of violating Canada's international Helsinki obligations by denying religious Jews living in Quebec the ability to abide by Jewish dietary laws during the holy days."

While Libman was not sure whether the Helsinki agreement, signed in 1975 by 52 countries, including Canada, was actually broken since no Jews were ultimately kept from celebrating Passover, the concerns expressed are valuable because "it's important to head these things off at the pass," he said.

"If the situation were taken to an extreme and Jews could not obtain matzah, then I think you could make the case that there had been a violation [of Helsinki]."

Moreover, expressions of concern from across the border — which Quebec has historically been sensitive to — could serve to make the Quebec government think twice about hardening its language policies and encourage it to bring more minorities into the public sector, Libman said.

Bernard said the U.S. committee probably chose to use the phrase, "had the effect of violating" the Helsinki agreement because it could not conclude whether the Office de la Langue Francaise "set out" to violate rights when it cracked down on Passover products.

"The question is whether it is systemic or not," Bernard said.

Like Libman, Bernard suggested that U.S. concerns should give pause to the Quebec government "to re-evaluate what it is doing" in regards to any changes it is considering to language or language policing policy.

In a response to the committee, chaired by New York Senator Alfonse D'Amato and New Jersey Congressman Christoper Young, Chretien said their concerns were conveyed to Quebec and referred to the recent accord between CJC and the Office de la Langue Francaise.

A spokesperson for the U.S. committee, Michael Hathaway, was reported as saying that the issue of Quebec minority rights could be raised in November at a Vienna meeting of the Organization on Security and Cooperation in Europe, which oversees the Helsinki agreement.

Charting Netanyahu's political road map

Across my desk last week I received from the Canada-Israel Committee a transcript of the interview on Sept. 11 of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu conducted by Bill Cameron of CBC Newsworld Morning News.

It was the first interview offered to the Canadian media by the prime minister of Israel. Due to the early hour of its original telecast however, it was missed by many. That was unfortunate, because the interview was particularly interesting.

In addition to eliciting the "usual" substantive policy responses from the elected leader of the Israeli people, Cameron also attempted to open a channel into the "inner man," to gain some insight into the character and personality of his subject.

I reproduce excerpts from the interview.

Cameron: Mr. Netanyahu, I think in most lives, there comes a moment in which your world view comes into focus, when it becomes quite clear to you suddenly what's right and what's wrong, what must be defended, what must be opposed. Was there a moment like that for you?

Netanyahu: Very early on, I think. I must have been 17 or 18...Probably the coming of age when you recognize that you're going to devote a good part of your life to the defence of your people, the defence of the Jewish state. It's a passage that young people make choosing the focus of their idealism. And that was the passage that I passed.

Cameron: Was there an incident particularly that crystallized the view of the world that you have now?

Netanyahu: It's hard to say. I mean, I try to think about my views and write them down over the years and I've had the advantage before coming to office of actually writing what I think, what I want to do. And that is a good place, if not to crystallize, at least to put together the basic thinking that guides my policies. Now obviously, you come in, you find a different reality. You find the jagged edges of rocks, of facts, of things that you didn't necessarily anticipate and you have to say: How does that fit the road map that you created? Do you have to adjust your route, do you have to change the map altogether or merely move slightly to the left or slightly to the right? And that is more or less the way I operate...Obviously there may be changes in the application of things, but not in the general course.

Seizing the opportunity, Cameron then asked the prime minister about his change of heart regarding an earlier vow not to meet with Yasser Arafat. Netanyahu acknowledged the change, but added that it was no longer appropriate to refuse to meet with Arafat.

It was clear, however, from the manner in which he continued his probing, that Cameron was not trying to catch the prime minister out in a contradiction. Rather, he was looking for something more in the prime minister's thinking, something that would reach beyond the stock answers on which he had been briefed by his advisors, something which might shed a public light on a private thought.

Netanyahu: Arafat was one of the things that I inherited from the previous [government]. He is there. He represents the Palestinians. I have to deal with him. I chose to deal with him.

Cameron: When you looked into his eyes... Well I've watched the moment of that meeting several times, that image. You looked directly at him, he looks around the room for some reason. When you finally catch his eye, what do you see there?

Finding real acceptance

Netanyahu: I've yet to determine that. I would like to see somebody whose word counts, who's made a commitment to coexist with Israel, not as a tactical steppingstone for future conflict, but a real acceptance of the fact that a Jewish state exists in the Middle East and will continue to exist forever; somebody who keeps his commitments on security and fighting terrorism. For me, it's a question mark. I don't fail to give him credence, to give him leeway; I just don't shut my eyes to the possibility that I'll be disappointed.

One has the feeling that the prime minister was slightly taken aback by the unconventionality of the question. At the outset, he appears to be repeating a "position," restating, more or less, a stock answer, rather than respond to the question actually posed.

But in mid-answer, he does what he had merely moments ago told Cameron was one of his chief hallmarks. He adjusts. Sensing a less hard-edged political focus by his interviewer, he softens somewhat the emphasis of his response: "I don't fail to give him credence, to give him leeway."

The prime minister continues in this vein. He delivers an unambiguous message but uses softer, non-ideological images, thus even more effectively making his point.

Cameron: He's a man who has used terrorism in the past to advance political ends. Terrorism continues in the Middle East now. Do you believe that he is still involved in using terrorism for political ends?

Netanyahu: No. He is not and he underwent two phases. First, when he signed the Oslo accords, he himself stopped ordering his own Fatah organization to perpetrate terrorism and they, indeed, stopped. He, however, did not stop other terrorist organizations operating from the domains that he controlled from perpetrating terrorism against us. That is Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Basically, he turned a blind eye and let them attack us to exert pressure on us. In the past few months, he stopped that too. And the point that I made to him was that this is not a choice. This is not something you decide to do, to fight terrorism one day and then not fight it the next day. It's not a variable. It has to be a constant. And I said, if it's not a constant, if you revert to the old pattern of allowing these other terrorist groups to operate from your territory, then we will operate differently and the peace process would collapse. And he said to me: "We're not going back." I will see that he lives up to his commitment.

Netanyahu's response to Cameron's question about Arafat was expert.

He achieved at least three positive results. He explained the nuances of Israel's policy to his Canadian audience in a manner readily understandable and acceptable. He conveyed a progressive attitude to the Palestinian leader, thus demonstrating his reasoned and reasonable approach to finding peace with the Palestinians: "He [Arafat] is not [involved in terrorism]." He also showed himself to be a firm, demanding leader: "I will see that he [Arafat] lives up to his commitment."

The interview cast light on both the interviewer and his subject. Both views were illuminating.

Libel lawsuit costs mount for rabbi

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A respected local rabbi says he's facing a crippling legal bill defending a $4.5-million libel lawsuit brought against him by the head of the worldwide Kabbalah Centre.

Rabbi J. Immanuel Schochet says he's already out of pocket about $10,000 and looking at legal fees many times that.

Over the High Holy Days, flyers and posters at several Toronto synagogues outlined the three-year-old dispute and called for a "Rabbi's Legal Defense Fund."

The material was the brainchild of several local Orthodox synagogue members who feel Rabbi Schochet's battle has been ignored by the community for too long.

"Can we afford the luxury of not getting involved?" the poster asks.

The case goes back to 1993, when Rabbi Philip Berg, the spiritual leader and director of the global Kabbalah Learning Centre, launched a $2.5-million lawsuit against Rabbi Schochet. As well, the centre is seeking $2 million in damages.

Rabbi Berg and the centre accuse Rabbi Schochet of having libeled and slandered them in a speech Rabbi Schochet delivered in Johannesburg, South Africa, in May, 1993.

According to court documents, Rabbi Berg alleges the speech damaged his reputation by falsely suggesting he instructs the centre's teachers to engage in "deceptive and fraudulent" practices.

As well, Rabbi Berg says the speech questioned his credentials and falsely suggested he has led a "scandalous" personal life.

Rabbi J. Immanuel Schochet

Even though the speech was made in South Africa, Rabbi Berg says tapes of it have been bought and sold around the world.

The case is winding its way through the courts. Rabbi Berg's lawyer, John B. Laskin, told The CJN there has been a motion filed to refer the matter to a beit din (rabbinical court).

He said any further questions can be put to Rabbi Berg.

The CJN's requests for an interview with Rabbi Berg were referred to The Lee Solters Company, a public relations firm in Beverly Hills, Calif..

Through the firm, Rabbi Berg turned down an interview, saying he may discuss the matter when it's resolved.

For his part, Rabbi Schochet says he's spent over $10,000 hunting down documents and on other research. He told The CJN he's spent thousands of dollars on long-distance telephone calls alone.

A respected kabbalist, teacher and spiritual leader of Beth Joseph Lubavitch, a 50-family congregation in the Bathurst-Wilson area, Rabbi Schochet said he wants the case heard by a beit din.

There's a branch of the Kabbalah Centre on Sheppard Avenue near Bathurst. It continues to draw members for services and lectures, and sells books, tapes and videos of Rabbi Berg's sermons.

The booming New York-based centre has dozens of other branches in the United States, Mexico, France, Israel and elsewhere, teaching that kabbalah — Jewish mysticism — is the key to happiness and spiritual fulfilment.

The centre has drawn ire from rabbinic groups in North America and Israel, warning that the study of kabbalah must be preceded by expertise in Talmud and Torah.

Rabbi Schochet has "the full support and backing" of Toronto's Vaad Harabanim, the umbrella group for Orthodox rabbis, Vaad chair Rabbi Moshe Stern told The CJN.

In cases like this, "even if you win, you lose," Rabbi Schochet said, pointing to his ballooning costs and the effort being spent on the file. "That's the whole principle of libel chill."

Canadians explore science at Weizmann

TORONTO — Samantha Fienberg, 18, launched her post-secondary studies in molecular biology working in the lab of a top cancer research scientist at one of the world's most prestigious science institutes.

Fienberg was one of 71 students from 18 countries who took part in this year's Dr. Bessie F. Lawrence International Summer Science Institute, a five-week program at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot. Most of the participants — there were six Canadians — were recent high school graduates with a keen interest in science.

Being with "like-minded science nerds" from all over the world was the best part of the trip, Fienberg, a first year science major at McGill University, said in a recent interview. "Everyone got along. We had a shared interest in science."

Fienberg had to prove her interest in science before being accepted into the program. But that was easy for her. As part of a special co-op program in her last year of high school, she spent three afternoons a week working in the lab of Dr. Mark Minden, head of leukemia research at Princess Margaret Hospital.

At the Weizmann Institute, she worked under Dr. Yossi Yarden, a leader in lymphoma research.

Fienberg and her fellow participants all did presentations of their work in the seminar that concluded the program.

"It was a challenging program. A real hands on learning experience," she said.

Fienberg said she would like to do graduate work at Weizmann.

The student program also included trips to Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Eilat, the Galilee and a five-day excursion to the Ein Gedi Field School, where participants carried out research on the wildlife, ecology and climate of the area.

"It was such a great idea to integrate science with travelling," she said, adding that she and members of the group are trying to keep in touch by e-mail.

Israeli parties not far apart: prof.

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – The victory of Benjamin Netanyahu and the Likud in the Israeli election of three months ago should not be taken as a rejection of the peace process, an Israeli professor and political commentator recently told a large gathering at the Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

"Netanyahu after the [Rabin] assassination was behind in the polls and only began to catch up when he abandoned the strategy of rejection of the Oslo process and adopted the strategy of 'peace with security,'" said Gabriel Ben-Dor, a faculty member at the University of Haifa, who spoke on the topic, Israel Three Months After Netanyahu's Election.

The two main sides in the election were really not far apart and the change in Israel's political climate has not been nearly as great as foreign observers might suppose, Ben-Dor said.

"The Israeli body politic has been split almost down the middle for 25 years, and a small shift can make a big difference," he said.

"Netanyahu spoke of 'peace with security,' whereas Peres spoke of "security with peace.' Netanyahu was very clever in not conceding the peace issue to Peres. He said, 'We are for peace, a good peace with security, and you have not delivered.'"

Besides the Hamas terrorist bombings, another factor that helped defeat the government of Shimon Peres was a widespread feeling among Israeli Jews that it was not Jewish enough, Ben-Dor said.

"They did not stand up for the rights of the Jews, they did not project a feeling of pride in Jewish tradition and history and they became almost alienated from Judaism," he said. "People resented the fact that they showed all kinds of sensitivity to the rights of others but not to the Jews."

After his victory, Netanyahu attempted to appear like a U.S.-style president, Ben-Dor said, and quickly alienated David Levy, Ariel Sharon, Benny Begin and other potential cabinet members.

"Netanyahu had to swallow a bitter pill to shake Arafat's hand, but it was much harder for him to shake Levy's hand.

"Had he been generous in victory, that would have been accepted. Instead, he tried to push everyone out and made an enemy of everyone, then brought them inside. Now the Trojan horse is inside and he doesn't trust them."

Ben-Dor praised Netanyahu for initiating economic reforms like privatization and deregulation to give Israel more of an American-style free-market economy. But he noted that he lacks support even within his own party for such measures. And he said that the prime minister had been wrongly blamed for suspending negotiations with the Palestinians and the troop redeployment in Hebron, since it was actually Peres who broke off the peace process after the Hamas bombings.

"The real difference between Netanyahu and Peres is culture," he said. "Peres has a very lofty and sublime vision of peace and a new Middle East... He had so much invested in the process he was willing to make concessions that should not have been made.

"Netanyahu, on the other hand, speaks the language of skepticism and doubt. He...is a correction device to the course taken by the previous government. He does not have a clear vision of peace. What he's saying is that Peres had a vision of peace that was full of holes and confused reality with wishful thinking. And many Israelis agree."

Like U.S. President Bill Clinton, Netanyahu is "a teflon person whose personal life is beyond belief," said Ben-Dor, noting that Netanyahu still enjoys the support of Orthodox rabbis.

"He's a man who learns quickly and corrects himself quickly... Most important, he has a lucky hand. Peres had the bad luck of the massive Hamas incidents, which totally lost him the election. Bibi has been lucky in the sense of being able to control events and not being controlled by them."

Noting that the new government hasn't lost touch with the wishes of the people, Ben-Dor said it is still too early to judge Netanyahu's performance on the peace process.

Ben-Dor's lecture was made possible by the family of the late Harry Posen, in whose memory it was dedicated.

Jewish Agency rep helps teens in FSU

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last year a total of 2,800 teenagers from the former Soviet Union who wanted to go to high school in Israel were not as lucky as the 1,200 who did go for one, two or three years.

"We had to leave them behind because of budget restrictions," said Alla Levy, head of the Jewish Agency for the former Soviet Union (FSU) and Eastern Europe.

During a three-day visit to Toronto under the auspices of the United Jewish Appeal, Levy said 95 per cent of the FSU teenagers who go to high school in Israel make alilyah and that most of their parents immigrate there as well.

"We feel badly that we couldn't accept the 2,800, or the 4,500 the year before," said Levy, herself a former refusenik who discovered her Jewish roots under the hard Soviet conditions.

The Jewish Agency's Hebrew education program in the FSU trained 2,000 teachers, but 30 percent of them made aliyah. Today there are 500 Hebrew teachers in local communities.

This year, Israel expects to receive 60,000 immigrants from the FSU. Because of the reduced Jewish population, this is far fewer than the 330,000 a year who came at the beginning, but the 60,000 figure represents five percent of the Jewish population compared to three per cent who emigrated three years ago. The total Jewish population remaining in the FSU is 1.3 million.

Because of distressed conditions in the Caucasus, Levy said that in three to five years, there will be no Jews left in the ancient communities of Georgia (present Jewish population 10,000) or Azerbaijan (35,000). About 15 percent of the Jews in Georgia and Azerbaijan are emigrating to Israel every year.

To debate whether there is an increase or decrease in anti-Semitism in the FSU is a waste of time, Levy said. "It is there. It expresses itself intensively through the press. If there was state anti-Semitism formerly, there is no state anti-Semitism now. After perestroika there was street anti-Semitism with attacks on Jews in the streets. It is most visible in the press, which can be dangerous."

With 85 emissaries to the FSU, 30 offices from the Baltic to the Far East and sponsoring direct flights to Israel from 20 exit points, the Jewish Agency is busy.

There are no restrictions on emigration to Israel, Levy said. "The government authorities are well aware that the Jewish problem is not an internal one; it is international, owing to the support and interest of Israel and the Diaspora."

Levy said her message to Toronto is this: "If we don't care, who will care? We should remember our responsibility, probably our debt, to the generations of our grandmothers and grandfathers and their parents who came from the FSU They were isolated for decades, not by choice. They need our help."

Yachdav expected to draw about 500

TORONTO — This winter, young adults from across Canada will travel to Basel, Switzerland, and on to Israel as part of Yachdav, an international young leadership mission sponsored by Canadian Jewish federations and United Israel Appeal of Canada.

Yachdav '96 is expected to attract 500 participants, ages 25 to 40, from 30 different countries. Scheduled to run from Dec. 29 to Jan. 6, the mission will afford participants the opportunity to network with young Jewish adults from all over the world.

In Basel, participants will be addressed by Avraham Burg, chair of the Jewish Agency, at an opening banquet in Casino Hall — the same hall used by Theodor Herzl, 100 years ago to convene the first ever Zionist Conference.

In Israel, participants will meet with government politicians, defence experts and business leaders. Participants will also visit absorption centres and Youth Aliyah villages and greet a planeload of new olim as they arrive at Ben-Gurion Airport.

Visits to the Diaspora Museum in Tel Aviv and Yad Vashem in Jerusalem are also on the itinerary. A tour of Israel's Negev region features a meeting with the Egyptian ambassador to Israel and a look at how Partnership 2000 programs are transforming the Negev.

The cost for the mission is $1,580 for participants from Toronto and Montreal; $1,480 for participants from western Canada. The fee is based on departure from Toronto and is subject to a minimum gift set by local federations. For more information, call 1-800-657-4772, or your local Jewish federation. Armies poised

As these words are being written, the borders separating Israel from Lebanon and Syria are a potential tinderbox, where intentionally or unintentionally, the slightest military spark could ignite a fire storm.

Syria's president, ruler, strongman and dictator Hafez al-Assad recently ordered a third of his 35,000 troops in Lebanon to be redeployed from the hills surrounding Beirut, much closer to Israel, to the central valley of the Bekaa region. According to Reuters News Agency, most of the redeployed soldiers have taken up positions near Syrian anti-aircraft batteries between the Bekaa and the Syrian border in the shadow of Mount Hermon.

Naturally, the Syrian moves have caused great concern in Jerusalem, in Washington, in some European capitals and even in some Middle Eastern capitals. They are obviously designed to rattle and confuse, to engender speculation and anxiety, and possibly to provoke. But the massive movement of troops on the ground is not a game played on a board. Syrian military manoeuvres have invited Israeli counter-manoeuvres. The two armies are now facing each other. When armies are poised against each other, the powder is never dry. And nerves that are taut can always snap.

The American administration reacted by seeking clarification of Syrian intentions. Diplomatic notes were exchanged, but apparently no Syrian assurances were forthcoming. U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher is scheduled to visit Damascus this week.

Adding to the tension was the renewed fighting last week between the Iranian/Syrian surrogate forces, the Hezbollah, and Israel.

Armed with the comfortless knowledge that the strongman is calculating but not eccentric, the Israeli public is rightly worried. Noted military correspondent Ze'ev Schiff, speculated on those Syrian designs last week in the daily newspaper Ha'aretz: "Is this a signal that Syria is not deterred by Israeli warning of broad action should Hezbollah act and that she may in response be ready to expand such fighting to the Golan Heights?"

It was at this time, approaching the eve of Yom Kippur, 23 years ago, when war was let loose upon Israel. As the Jewish people around the world again prepares for the arrival, in a matter of hours, of Yom Kippur, we pray that these feelings of foreboding are only for our Atonement and not for the fires of war.

The real truth

Tony Martin is a professor of Africana Studies at Wellesley College in Massachusetts. He is the author of the book The Jewish Onslaught.

The first two sentences of the Introduction of the book are: "In January 1993, I was minding my own business and teaching my Wellesley College survey course on African American History when a funny thing happened. The long arm of Jewish intolerance reached into my classroom." The very last line of the Introduction is the following: "The press release against me [issued by the Anti-Defamation League], I now realize, is a classic textbook case study of organized Jewish intimidation." In between the first lines and the last lines of the Introduction, and indeed throughout the entire book, is an uninhibited torrent of anti-Jewish writing of the most odious kind. Martin's malicious screed along with the notorious The Jews and Their Lies by Martin Luther were both on sale at the appearance of Louis Farrakhan last week in Toronto. Farrakhan professed to wanting "to speak truth out of a spirit of love." But as we have seen time and time again, the spirit of his love is enmeshed in a message of hate for others.

We know him for what he does and for what he says. This is the real truth about Louis Farrakhan. Unlike timid federal immigration officials, most other people know him by that truth too.

PNC's true intentions toward Israel

It is surprising that there are well-meaning people who, in the face of all the evidence, still believe that the Palestine National Council has removed from its charter the clauses calling for Israel's destruction.

The following news report on Israeli Radio channel 7, Sept. 10, may, however, raise some doubts in their minds about the true intentions of the Palestinian leadership.

"In an appearance on Syrian television on the English-language interview program Focus at 9:30 p.m. on Sept. 9, Faisal Husseini, who holds the Jerusalem portfolio for the Palestinian Authority, was asked what the boundaries of Palestine are. In response, Husseini replied that all Palestinians agree that the just boundaries of Palestine are the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea. He explained that, realistically, whatever can be obtained now should be accepted and that subsequent events, perhaps in the next 15 or 20 years, would present an opportunity to realize the just boundaries of Palestine."

Husseini was interviewed in Damascus during his visit there.

What is most amazing is that Palestinian leaders make such clear statements about their true intentions regarding Israel, in full confidence that the U.S. government and the "peace camp" — with the connivance of the world media — will either ignore them (as evidenced by the lack of attention paid to this latest example), or try to disguise their true intent by putting a positive "spin" on them.

Bring witnesses on Nazi crimes to Canada

If I was a member of the aging Jewish community, I would be mad and upset about the proposal by the Somalia Inquiry to bring witnesses to Canada to testify at hearings.

Not to belittle the significance of the Somali situation, but where has Canada been since 1945, when I am sure many survivors of Nazi attrocities unable to afford the cost but subsidized by Canadian funds would have gladly testified in this country?

How come an inquiry board can now provide the funds necessary to being witnesses from Africa and Somalia but continues to allow known accused Nazi exterminators to live out their lives as welcome citizens of Canada? Why?

I am disgusted with our politicians who can set up an inquiry to discredit the Canadian army, but refuse to do anything about the Nazis living out their lives in our country.

Any Uszerowicz descendants in Toronto?

I am looking for members of my father's family, Gerszon Uszerowicz, son of Abram, born 1917 or 1918 in Poland, who lived in Bialystok until World War II, on Florianska Street.

During the war, he served as a soldier with the Second Division of the Polish army in Russia.

The last letter, dated Sept. 28, 1945, came from Jelenia Gora in Poland. A number of years ago, I was told that family members under the name of Ash may possibly reside in Toronto.

Borges did not win Nobel Prize

In the Sept. 5 issue, in an otherwise interesting and informative article, Bernard Baskin refers to Jorge Luis Borges as a "Spanish Nobel Prize winner." Borges was Argentinian, not Spanish, and while he won a number of prestigious prizes in his lifetime, he was never awarded the Nobel Prize for literature.

Perspectives

The compatibility of science and Torah

Two structures stand on different cornerstones

By PAUL BRUMER

With the cycle of Torah reading beginning once again with parshat Bereishit comes the usual flood of questions regarding the relationship between the Torah's description of the creation of the universe and the view currently held by the scientific community.

Related questions arise about evolution, apparent discrepancies in the age of the universe, the clockwork universe versus free will. Such questions reflect an underlying concern that there are fundamental and deep discrepancies between scientific understanding and religious belief and, more disturbingly, that these differences somehow cast doubt on the validity of the religious Jewish perspective. It is my view, however, that science and Judaism coexist with little if any discord and that much of the apparent religion-science conflict stems from misapplication of the principles upon which science and religion rest.

In this article I briefly summarize a perspective on Science and religion (more properly Science and Torah) which I have evolved over a 30-year period as a professional Orthodox Jewish scientist. The reader should note, however, that I am not an expert in the area of "Science and religion."

Nonetheless, it seems to me that the perspective I advocate provides a simple understanding of the non-confrontational relationship between scientific thought and religious Jewish belief.

Consider first some of the essential principles upon which science actually rests. Traditional science is concerned with facts about nature: their experimental observation, explanation, categorization and eventual synthesis under the umbrella of a general theory.

A scientific theory without experimental observation is mere hypothesis. Similarly, facts without a unifying theory are just tabulated observations.

Thus, a complete scientific understanding of a topic consists of observations explained by an adequate (and usually simple) theory which has predictive power, i.e. has the ability to anticipate the outcome of experiments not yet performed.

In analyzing data and in formulating theories, the scientist ultimately relies on an essential tool – human reason in general and logic in particular. It is the supreme judge of whether a viewpoint, theory or explanation is acceptable. This is as it should be, since science is a human endeavor and needs a human system for evaluating scientific truth. Appreciating this role of logic in science is the first item essential to an understanding of the issue of science and religion.

By contrast, religion is based upon an entirely different cornerstone – faith. Human reason plays no role in the fundamental beliefs which underly religious faith, nor does it need to.

This too is as it should be, since the deepest issues in religious faith transcend human comprehension. Thus, for example, it is of little consequence that there is no scientific evidence that there is a G-d; nor does Judaism either need or expect such a proof. (Indeed, there would be no Avodah, and hence no reward, associated with believing in G-d if there were incontrovertible evidence of G-d's existence).

The prophet Jeremiah, as painted by Giovanni F.B. Guercino, appears to look heavenward for answers. From The Law and the Prophets, Harry N. Abrams Inc.

Thus, science has reason as its cornerstone and religion has faith. The standard "problem" of science versus religion stems from a blurring of these lines, in particular in the attempt to logically judge the basic principles of religious belief.

However, one can no more apply reason to the fundamental belief principles of religion than one can argue for the validity of a scientific principle on the basis of faith.

Consider the following analogy. A student of mathematics takes an examination which asks 24 times 3 = ?, 18 divided by 3 =, etc. The tools required to address these questions were taught in math class, but the student, confused, utilizes those taught in his history class. He begins to answer: "Historically, the technique of multiplication developed long after that of addition. Further, the general idea of the equal sign was thought of only in the year..." Clearly his response may make sense within one discipline, but totally misses the point in mathematics.

Similarly, a response in a history examination which asks the student to analyze the War of 1812 receives no credit if he states that 1812 can be written as 3 times 604 or 6 times 302. These responses are wrong because the student has used the tools of a different discipline to address the question. In the same way, it is my contention that a major problem arising in attempts to understand the interrelationship of science and religion is that of the misapplication of the tools of one discipline within the other.

Reliance on logic versus faith is the fundamental difference between science and religion. This difference is far more relevant than discrepancies in views about particular aspects of nature, such as evolution, cosmology or cosmogony. The religious reliance on faith is unpalatable to the scientist, whereas the scientists' requirement for proof is far too restrictive for the religious. But the recognition and proper application of these different modes of approach is the key to their harmonious coexistence.

Typically, a careful application of the principles of faith to religious matters and of logic to scientific matters generally suffices to clarify many of the problems which appear to arise at the interface of science and religion. In doing this, it is often quite simple to resolve what appear to be fundamental problems in the harmony of science and religion.

Consider as an example the issue of the age of the universe. Scientific studies suggest that the universe is far older than is suggested by the Torah. However, one can propose numerous simple theories which agree both with scientific measurement and with religious belief. For example, a perfectly acceptable explanation is that G-d created the world "old," i.e. with a lengthy geological historical record. This is an acceptable religious statement because we understand G-d to be omnipotent and capable of having created the world, even yesterday, as we see it today. It is also an acceptable scientific explanation, since it is experimentally impossible to distinguish a world which was created old from a world which has evolved over some extended time period.

The key point here is that by working with the tools of each "discipline" in its own discipline, we obtain a solution consistent both with science and with religion. Problems arise, however, in attempting to cross over the reason/faith barrier saying, for example, that it is not logical for G-d to have created an "old" world.

Why is my view so straightforward (and hence this article comparatively short), whereas courses are taught on the problem of science and religion and several recent Jewish-based books have been written on the subject? I don't know, but I will hazard a guess based on the nature of some of these recent publications.

Specifically , it appears that many of these books assume that Judaism needs science to justify its validity. Thus we find an ongoing effort to use discoveries in science, such as special relativity or chaos theory to validate the Torah. Since science is an honest effort to understand the nature of the created universe, we expect it to continue to reveal truths which are consistent with the Torah perspective. However, this is quite different than requiring science as justification for the validity of religion. Doing this incorrectly adopts the view that reason is the ultimate judge, even as it applies to faith.

Reason is a tool which man uses in order to understand the world, evaluate information and guide his behavior. It is the proper tool to establish scientific truths. However, it is not the only guide that we use in our lives, nor is it the only arbiter of knowledge. For example, we all act, often correctly, on the basis of emotions such as love, anger or fear. Similarly, although it is not as well known, even modern scientific approaches recognize the importance of intrinsic features of theories such as "beauty," which are more esthetic than they are logical. Analogously, we all recognize that many areas of knowledge, such as art and music have non-reason-based ways of approaching issues and making valid contributions. Thus, we should not be uneasy about relying upon the historically transmitted faith of our people as one appropriate mode of operation.

One clarification is necessary to avoid misunderstanding. I am in no sense arguing that reason plays no role in religious practice. There are many issues within religion which are understandable by expertly applied human logic and indeed require its application.

Nonetheless, as one approaches the fundamentals of religious belief, this kind of scrutiny is no longer appropriate and we reach fundamentals about which "Ani ma'amim b'emunah shleimah" (I believe with perfect faith) must be said.

Finally, if the reader plans to consider apparent science-Torah controversies I urge a careful analysis of traditional religious texts, including a clear understanding of what is actually said and what is not; a careful analysis of the scientific result, including a clear understanding of the underlying hypotheses; and adherence to the requirement that belief is a valid mode of operation on issues which are beyond human understanding. All too often, misunderstandings arise from insufficient adherence to these principles.

Reciprocity needed from Arab side

Now Benjamin Netanyahu, too, has shaken Arafat's hand, and they say it is the same thing. But it isn't at all. The previous one meant "Land for Peace," whereas now we have a new word in the political dictionary — reciprocity. Previously it was give-and-take, with — as a cynic might put it — Israel doing all the giving and the Arabs all the taking. Now, if "reciprocity" is taken seriously, this is ruled out.

By Emil Fackenheim

Sooner or later this should find ideological expression. "Peace for Land" can mean we'll give back land belonging to them, that the whole land is really Arab, that Tel Aviv too belongs to them and that they reserve the right to do something about it if and when it is convenient. That view lurks behind Arafat's twists and turns about the PLO Covenant.

But this is the Arab view of the conflict and, despite 100 years of Zionism, it is widely shared by the media. The true view of the conflict is that there are two claims to the whole land — theirs because they have lived on it, ours because we have come back to it, our land, the claim to which we have never surrendered.

Netanyahu's party represents this latter view openly, but now he has shaken Arafat's hand. This does not mean that he has abandoned the Zionist claim, but that it is voluntarily given up in part, for the sake not only of peace but also of justice.

But reciprocity requires a corresponding step from the other side. Arafat's twists and turns about the PLO Covenant warrant our suspicion that his peace is only temporary. Needed are not a few words changed in the Covenant, but a declaration that since there are two claims to the land, and since Israel gives up its claim in part, they can do no less than the same.

This might also restore the prestige of Zionism, as a cause second to none in justice, in a century which has seen little justice.

An ideal worth striving for Jews in America and around the world must understand the meaning of our dream to return to Israel and Jerusalem. The themes of Jerusalem and kibbutz galuyot, the ingathering of the exiles, are central themes of our liturgy.

By David Hartman

Why did the tradition make our return to the land, to Jerusalem, an essential feature of Jewish identity? Why did land and nation become constitutive elements of Jewish self-understanding?

To be a Jew is to be claimed by 3,000 years of history. The individual is the carrier of a legacy, of a covenantal promise to become a holy nation (goy kadosh). The Jewish family, therefore, was always imbued with a national purpose: to mediate the founding memories of the Jewish people for the next generation. A parent's central concern was to nurture a sense of being claimed (mitzvah).

In contrast to the traditional family, the modern Jewish family is understood in psychological terms, with individual happiness and adjustment the central values of parental concern. The family is essentially future-oriented. History and memory are peripheral if not totally irrelevant to the overriding concern with the child's psychic and economic well-being.

The language of aliyah, however, is predicated on the premise that the "I," the individual, can shape and be shaped by the "we," the nation. For aliyah to become a serious option, the notion of the self must become more relational and community oriented. Individual self-realization must be informed by notions of shared history and memory. Unless we overcome the ethos of self-sufficiency, aliyah language will have little chance of being heard.

The message of aliyah should convey the idea of privilege – the privilege of bringing up children with a sense of history – of something being asked of them. This must become the central thrust of aliyah as a language of aspiration.

As a Jew who lives in Jerusalem, who loves Jerusalem, who feels privileged to have brought his family here, I can testify to the excitement and authenticity of living in a nation shaping its future identity.

In contrast to my life in the Diaspora, my celebration of the festivals is not an existential protest against my environment. On Yom Kippur, the streets of Jerusalem mirror the inner sanctity of the day. Here my public self talks to my private self, my outer world shapes – and is shaped by – my inner world.

Even though I feel anger and frustration when I read the morning papers and realize that my efforts at changing things through education are being undermined by short-sighted Knesset members bent on legislating Judaism, yet I feel alive. I am angry, I am pained, but I am energized by the excitement of fighting to shape a nation that doesn't yet know what it wants to be.

Israel is the public face of the Jewish people and aliyah is a call to shape that public face. Time magazine follows us wherever we go. Whatever happens in Jerusalem is immediately broadcast on CNN worldwide. We cannot hide; we cannot become Marranos.

Anyone who cares about the legacy of Jewish history must realize one thing: the future of Jews in America and everywhere else will be defined by the type of Jewishness we build in Israel. If we fail, Diaspora Jewry will be ashamed to show its public face. If fundamentalism and delegitimization of others grow here, we won't be able to talk about the ethical legacy of the Jewish people. We won't be able to repair the public shame of Yigal Amir's fanaticism.

The issue of aliyah, then, is: Who are we going to be? Jews who value pluralism and tolerance, who understand the meaning of freedom of conscience; or Jews who returned to their own country only to act as if they never heard about democracy or fought to preserve the rights of minorities?

Israel is not only a call to normalcy, to be like the nations. Israel is a call to fulfil the dream of Moses in a new way. And aliyah is a call to the individual to arise, to assume a dramatic role in history, to participate in nation-building.

If we can overcome the loss of memory and history and the embarrassment of the biblical and prophetic understanding of the role of Israel in history, and if the Jewish spiritual legacy can become personal conviction, then aliyah can regain the compelling power of an ideal worth striving for.

Jewish literacy

While a recent article in the Toronto Globe and Mail did not mention Jewish education, its contents have a lot to do with it. Harry Giles, founder of the Toronto French School, published a fascinating piece on school methods that failed and succeeded.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

To start with, he tells us that 47.2 percent of adults in Canada are illiterate, and that every Ontario university complains that too many of its entering students cannot read properly. Compare this with a survey taken 100 years ago, when it was claimed that Ontario had the highest education standards in the world. In 1911, every child in Grade 4 was able to read George Eliot's The Mill on the Floss — while today (so Giles says) most Grade 13 students are unable to master it. In the 1930s, Grade 1 students were expected to know 850 words; today the number is down to 300.

Many critics of today's system of teaching the art of reading point to the abandoning of phonics as one reason for this decline, and Giles claims that a combination of intense phonics plus expectation performs an old-fashioned miracle: In his school, Grade 1 children can read about 2,000 words, which is about seven times what other Ontario school children can do. And, mind you, this is done while the children learn to read both English and French at the same time — all this without neglecting math, music, art or even typing on the computer.

This column is not the place to discuss the merit of phonics, but it is the place where we can recall how Jews approached the problems and challenges of literacy. Number one, the cheder did not practise babysitting or coloring. The community expected children to study Torah right from the beginning, and it was the custom in many parts of Europe to start them with the Book of Leviticus, the most difficult in the Torah.

Number two, in addition to communal expectation, there was an age when it was deemed that children were fit to start reading. It was not age six, as nowadays in our public schools, but age four, and somehow the vast majority of Jewish students were able to accomplish the communal goal.

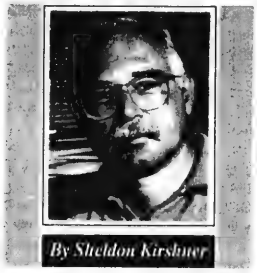
It is no surprise, therefore, that children who go to Jewish day schools are, on the whole, doing better than those who go to public schools. To be sure, there is some self-selection in that most of these children come from families where reading is prized. But expectation, too, plays a great role, so that these children cover the civic curriculum and study Hebrew subjects at the same time — with no sacrifice in either field.

I have heard some critics say that pressing children to read at an earlier age than is customary nowadays robs them of playtime. But what it really robs them of is the ability to expand the mind and, therefore, to enjoy a richer life right from the beginning. I am worried that in lowering standards and postponing our expectations until later, we deprive our youngsters of a vital opportunity to become truly literate. They can always learn to become "couch-potatoes" at a later time.

The Kirshner File

Film aficionados were not disappointed

Viewers looking for movies of Jewish interest at this year's Toronto International Film Festival were not disappointed. There were quite a few:



By Sheldon Kirshner

A Tickle in the Heart, Stefan Schwietert's sympathetic portrait of three geriatric klezmer musicians, Max, Willie and Julie Epstein, is simply delightful.

The Epstein brothers, born and bred in Brooklyn, live in a manicured retirement community in Florida, facetiously described as "God's waiting room." And although they are officially retired, they are busier than ever, their fans consisting of seniors who grew up with the sinuous sounds of klezmer and of younger people who've just discovered the wonders of its joyous/maudlin melodies.

The black-and-white 84-minute documentary, a cinematic ode to East European Jewish culture and to the indefatigable Epsteins, shifts zestfully from one locale to another.

The centrepiece of the film, which is frenetic, reflective and humorous, is the brothers' concert in Berlin. Now in their 80s, the Epsteins enchant a largely non-Jewish audience with a truly infectious performance. It belies their age and explains the residual popularity of this once-forgotten genre. The Epsteins are amazed that klezmer is back in vogue once more.

A Tickle in the Heart follows them to their late father's birthplace in Pinsk — where they search for his home and speak to oldtimers who recall Jewish neighbors — and to the Lower East Side, where they performed at chassidic weddings in the 1960s.

At the end of it all, the Epsteins express gratitude for having been klezmorim. And we, the viewers, thank Schwietert for having enthralled and amused us for the better part of one hour.

Andrzej Wajda, Poland's greatest living director, exhibits his immense talents in Holy Week, a stark, sensitive film which probes the minefield of Polish-Jewish relations during the 1943 Warsaw Ghetto uprising. Wajda has been there before with Korczak (1990), a biopic of the renowned Jewish author, educator and communal leader, Janos Korczak.

But in Holy Week, based on a novel written by Jerzy Andrzejewski in 1943, Wajda courageously plunges into the subject, as no other Polish film-maker has done before.

The 97-minute long movie opens with a sombre procession of Polish Jews being marched into a forest. An elderly man and his daughter watch from the safety of a clump of bushes. The furtive figures are, in fact, Jews. In an act of self-destruction, the man joins the marchers. His sullen daughter, Irena (Beata Fudalej), chooses to flee.

In Warsaw, by chance, she meets an old flame. Jan (Wojciech Malajkat), a Catholic engineer, offers her a hiding place in his flat in the suburbs. She gratefully accepts the offer. Jan, who seems to have been a member of an anti-Semitic student movement when he was younger, is clearly ambivalent about his act of kindness. "Did I do the right thing?" he asks his pregnant wife, Anna (Magdalena Warzecha). It's a pertinent question: Poles caught by the Germans helping Jews are subject to execution.

Anna, a blonde beauty cast in the mould of a Righteous Gentile, encourages her husband. All decent Poles, she suggests, should show solidarity with Jews in their hour of duress. So the die is cast: Irena, portrayed as a prickly woman, will remain with Jan and Anna. Their momentous decision constitutes but one layer of Holy Week, which unfolds over several days as the burning ghetto, an orange glow across a wall, is stormed by the Nazis.

Wajda is not merely interested in documenting the reaction of one Polish couple to the plight of a vulnerable Jewish woman. In an effort to draw a full-bodied portrait of Polish attitudes to Jews during the Holocaust, he introduces several stock characters to round off the narrative: Jan's archly anti-Semitic boss, who feels no pity whatsoever for Jews and is glad they are being persecuted; the boss' associate, who professes to be indifferent; Marta, an employee who's offended by his anti-Semitism and resigns in anger; Julek, Jan's brother, a member of a pro-Jewish Polish underground group; Jan's cultivated landlord, who fears that Irena's presence endangers them all; and the crass janitor of the building and his wife, who want Irena to leave but who will not betray her to the Germans.

In this powerful, doom-laden film, Wajda struggles valiantly with the moral ambiguities Poles faced during the German occupation. Some may find his approach a tad formulaic, but I believe he acquits himself honorably and well.

Judit Elek's paean, To Speak the Unspeakable: The Message of Elie Wiesel, portrays him as a tormented novelist who cannot be at peace with himself.

In this sombre documentary, which mixes current footage with archival films, Wiesel revisits the sleepy Transylvanian town of Sziget and the concentration camp synonymous with the Holocaust, Auschwitz-Birkenau.

Andrzej Wajda

Sziget, Hungarian prior to the war and Romanian since, attracts and repels Wiesel. He was born and raised in Sziget, which he regards with a measure of nostalgia. But Sziget was also the point from which the Wiesels, including his beloved sister, were unceremoniously shipped to Poland.

Wiesel and his friends are greeted by local dignitaries in Sziget, but the highlight of his trip — his fourth — is a brief encounter with a 91-year-old Jew whose brother, a physician, attended to the Wiesels when Elie Wiesel was a boy.

In Auschwitz, Wiesel and a companion silently walk among the ruins, shocked and dazed. William Hurt, the narrator, reads excerpts from All Rivers Run to the Sea, Wiesel's recently-published memoirs.

The film is framed by scenes from the 1993 inauguration of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington and Wiesel's acceptance of the 1986 Nobel Prize for peace. These are poignant clips of a survivor and a teller of words who still grapples with the enormity and inexplicableness of the Holocaust.

Richard Feynman was a brilliant scientist, the winner of the 1965 Nobel Prize in physics. Matthew Broderick's biopic, Infinity, scratches the surface but not the texture or depth of his life.

Although Infinity tries to flesh out his childhood, his years as a PhD student at Princeton and his work on the Manhattan Project, it is basically a one-dimensional and deracinated treatment of Feynman (Broderick). And because Infinity is obviously a commercial film, it lingers far too long on Feynman's relationship, however poignant, with his first wife, Arline Greenbaum (portrayed by a radiant, somewhat breathless Patricia Arquette). Structurally episodic and jumpy, Infinity peters out in the final 30 minutes.

Next week, I'll write about the remainder of the films I saw at the festival.

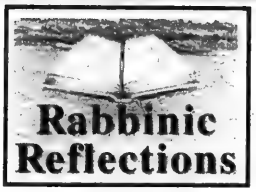
Jewish Life



Listening with heart and soul

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

I would like to tell you about a certain town in Poland and the rabbi of the town. Whenever the Jews of this town would purchase a lulav and etrog for the festival of Sukkot, they would bring them to the rabbi to check on their fitness and solicit his approval. If the lulav and etrog did not meet with his approval, they would be returned to the dealer.

One year the entire stock of imported lulavim and etrogim happened to be of inferior quality.

The ritualistic requirements for these objects clearly state that they must be of attractive color, delicate texture and, in general, esthetically appealing. The lulavim and etrogim in this particular shipment, however, were almost entirely of inelegant color, lumpish texture and graceless stature. Whenever residents brought their intended purchases to the rabbi, he had no alternative but to withhold his approval. Some purchasers made the rounds from the store to the rabbi and back again several times, only to meet with the rabbi's rejection on each occasion. As time went on, the etrog dealer's reputation was affected and his business dropped off.

Once, when the rabbi visited the dealer and asked him how he was doing, the shopkeeper responded shortly and curtly, with single syllable answers. The man was hurt by the rabbi's disapproval of his merchandise, but he refused to confront him for fear of showing the rabbi dishonor. So he simply held his feelings inside.

The rabbi returned home is a disturbed state. What was wrong with the dealer? Then, suddenly, it became clear to him what was taking place. The dealer's entire business was suffering due to the rabbi's rejection of the lulavim and etrogim. All year long, he waited for the holiday of Sukkot. Now, his major source of income was quickly drying up. The rabbi remembered that the man was married and had eight children. Very soon, he reasoned, they would face starvation. The next day the rabbi returned to the dealer.

He told him, "The procedure for approving etrogim and lulavim must be changed. From now on, whenever your customers come to me with the merchandise for approval, I want them to bring along two sets of etrogim and lulavim, not just one. I will not accept one set and I will not pass judgment over it. You understand, I must have in front of me two sets.

The shopkeeper did not understand, but he would not dare argue with the rabbi. Soon, almost miraculously, the dealer's business began to pick up. His shelves quickly began to empty and his customers were pleased once again.

The next time the rabbi visited the shop, the dealer could not restrain himself. He asked the rabbi what had happened, why his fortunes had suddenly changed.

The rabbi answered: "When I visited you the last time I had realized the difficult straits you and your family must be in. So I devised a little plan. When a single etrog shown to me is not attractive, I cannot say that it is. That would be an inexcusable misrepresentation. But when two pairs are shown to me, I will be able to say, honestly and sincerely, that this one is more attractive and appropriate than that one, that this one is better than the other, and recommend its purchase."

There are those who compare the etrog, due to its shape, to the human heart. On this festival of Sukkot, as we take hold of the etrog, let us recall the actions of this Polish rabbi. For he achieved something very special and very precious. He understood how, in the words of Theodore Reich, not only to listen with both ears, but to listen with the third ear, that ear found within the human soul and the human heart.

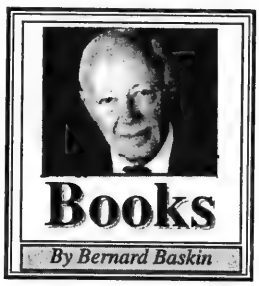
Mendele's stories still treasured gems years later



Tales of Mendele The Book Peddler, by S.Y. Abramovitsh (Random House, $35).

It is a delight to review this volume by the earliest of the three giants of Yiddish literature. The other two are I.L. Peretz and Shalom Aleichem.

While his real name was Solomon Jacob Abramovitsh, he wrote under the pen name of Mendele Mocher Seforim (Mendele the Book Seller). But to the thousands who loved and admired him, he was known simply as Mendele. Born in Lithuania in 1836, his stories and novels are to this day among the most treasured gems of Yiddish and Hebrew writing.

The two long stories in this book, Fishke the Lame and Benjamin the Third, recount the hardships encountered by residents of the Russian shtetl of a former era and are filled with colorful characters and narrated with unflagging vitality.

Fishke the Lame is a sardonic portayal of a brawling Russian-Jewish community unsettled by a pair of comically star-crossed lovers. The bookseller in his covered wagon makes a pilgrimage to the towns and villages of the old Pale of Settlement. He sleeps in its synagogues, cemeteries and cowshed, and meets and converses with almost everybody.

The Travels of Benjamin the Third, written with poetic artistry and typical Mendelian humor, is about the adventures of a dreamer who makes up his mind to go to Palestine and gets no further than Berdichev. The author was dubbed the "Jewish Cervantes" for this picaresque tale.

What made Mendele the favorite of the masses was that they found in him a friend and master they could understand.

In the very real sense, he was the spokesperson for Russian Jewry, its mirror, its photographer, its poet. Its men, women and children, its cities, towns and villages, its bigotry, fanaticism and superstitions are all part of the panorama he knew so well and described so masterfuly. His canvas is crowded with good and honest folk, but also with shams, scoundrels and vagabonds.

Mendele's world is destroyed — not a shred of it is left — the world of the covered wagon, the beggars, the vagabonds, the bath house, the lame, half-starved mare. Flames and ashes have buried his world. It belongs to the past. It was the world of the grandfathers; the grandchildren no longer know it.

The two stories are admirably translated and the volume is enhanced by a long and helpful introduction.

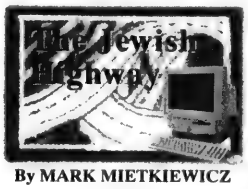
Internet site solves riddle of the seasonal 'lulav shake'



By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Question: "How do you make a lulav shake?" The answer may seem obvious, but on the Jewish Highway anything is possible.

Answer: "To make a lulav shake, take two scoops of mint-chocolate-chip ice cream or lime sherbet. Add celery stalk for Lulav. Top with lemon drops for Etrog." [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/tishri/lulav_sh/shake00.htm]

With the High Holy Days behind us, it is time to celebrate one of the most joyful festivals in the calendar, Sukkot/Shemini Atzeret/ Simchat Torah. The "lulav shake" riddle is taken from the Jewish Communication Network's site, where they have some novel ideas for teaching kids about Sukkot. But there is far more out there about the holiday.

For a comprehensive summary of traditions, see [http://members.aol.com/jewfaq/holiday5.htm] and [http://www.chabad.org/Holiday_Guides/Tishrei/main.htm#12]

From waving the lulav and etrog to sitting in the sukkah, the traditions of Sukkot are well known but what about the reasons behind them?

For a detailed description about the blessings over the lulav and etrog, and for some of the laws of the building of the sukkah, try [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/sukkot-8Atzeret/sukkot.htm].

There is much discussion about the "four species" (lulav, etrog, myrtle branch and willow branch), which are all bound together in order to say the blessing. Rabbi Irving "Yitz" Greenberg of CLAL, The National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership says that the species can teach us the difference between tolerance and pluralism among the Jewish people [http://www.jewish.com/bk951006/comm2.htm].

According to Rabbi Greenberg, we can disagree sharply with other Jews while admitting that they bring strength to Clal Yisrael. "And the great reward of this binding is that when disparate elements come together, their fragrance and flavor rub off on one another." For more on the relationship between the four species and the Jewish people, see Ohr Somayach's The Succah and the Four Species: Two Ways to Unity [http://www.virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/special/sukkos/succ95.htm] and Fore...Or the Origins of the Species" [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/succot.htm].

For all the botanists and historians out there, the Department of Biology at Tel Aviv University [http://www.tau.ac.il:80/botany/lulav.html] supplies you with the Latin names for the Etrog, Lulav, Hadas and Arava. And to show how the tradition has endured, there is also a photograph [http://www.tau.ac.il:80/botany/syn-flor.html] of the ancient mosaic on the synagogue floor of Hamat Tveria in Israel.

One of the other names for Sukkot is Zman Simchataynu, the Time of our Happiness. But in the essay Happiness is...A Cozy Succah [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/succah.htm], Robin Treistman uses unusual language to ask an important question: "Sukkot: what a bizarre holiday. Based on the commandments from the Torah, we do our major life activities in a hut decorated with hanging fruit (real or plastic depending on where you live)...but most bizarre of all, we are commanded to be happy. How can the Torah tell me to be happy?" The tone may be cheeky but question is profound.

It is a tradition to read King Solomon's Megillat Kohelet or the Book of Ecclesiastes during Sukkot. If your browser can handle Hebrew, you can read Kohelet in Hebrew at [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/bible/mkuhl.html]. Otherwise, the King James version is found at [http://www.jubilee.org:80/bible/21.ecclesiastes.html]. And for a thought-provoking essay on this book, see Futility and Cockroaches [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/kohelet.htm].

Granted, Kohelet is not quite as well known as Megillat Esther or the Song of Songs. However, a selection from Kohelet did attain popular fame a few years ago thanks to folk singer Pete Seeger. Seeger adapted the beginning of the book's third chapter for his song Turn, Turn, Turn [http://www.danmansmusic.com/songs/pete_seeger/turn_turn_turn.pro], which the rock group The Byrds recorded and made into a number one song.To hear an excerpt from that song, go to [http://www.music.sony.com/Music/Legacy/Byrds/turnturnturn.wav]. If your browser cannot already handle WAV audio files, then you'll need to download a program like WPLANY WAV Player for Windows [http://www.sirinet.net/~mikem/wavutil.htm] or SoundApp for Macintosh [http://www-cs-students.stanford.edu/~franke/SoundApp/]. Both programs are free.

For something more traditional but perhaps less familiar, you can listen to some Sefardi Pizmonim or tunes sung by Syrian Jews at Simchat Torah at [http://www.613.org/roshyomkippursuccot.html#s]. You'll need RealAudio available at [http://www.realaudio.com/products/player/index.html].

Although all Jewish holidays invariably have some connection to food, one of the strongest ties to food belongs to Sukkot whose other name is Chag Ha'assif, the harvest holiday. Louise Fiszer has prepared a Sukkot menu [http://www.bpe.com/food/recipes/fiszer/succoth.html] which includes Butternut Squash Vichyssoise, Carrot and Zucchini Salad and Ginger Almond Shortbread.

Sometimes overlooked on the trek from Sukkot to Shemini Atzeret is Hoshana Rabbah, the final day of Sukkot. Eliezer Siegel provides an interesting look at the day http://acs6.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/951005_HoshanaMoon.html] on which "the verdicts that were decreed on Yom Kippur are officially distributed to all mortals."

We have now reached the holiday of Shemini Atzeret/Simchat Torah during which we complete and with joy restart the cycle of reading the Torah [http://members.aol.com/jewfaq/holiday6.htm]. The British artist Emmanuel Levy has captured the spirit of this festival in his painting "Two Rabbis with the Scrolls of the Law" [http://www.ort.org/links/benuri/tour_4.htm]. (You can click on the picture to get a larger image.)

Before I end, there are a couple of examples of personal initiative on the Internet which deserve recognition. There are places on the Jewish Highway where you can order a sukkah (such as the National Sukkah Outlet [http://www.koshermall.com/nso/].) But take a look at the effort put in by Austin, Texas' Steven Weintraub with his detailed (and illustrated) Directions on building a Sukkah. [http://www.pswtech.com/~stevenw/jewish/sukkah.html].

And Avi Vorchheimer of Melbourne, Australia, has had a inspired idea with his Worldwide Succah Directory [http://www.succah.aust.org/]. His goal is to "compile a list of sukkahs throughout the world, so that Jews who are travelling during Sukkot can easily find a sukkah which is nearby that they can use." His database is not that full yet (unless you are looking for a sukkah in Melbourne), but this is the kind of creative use of the Internet that could make the World Wide Web indispensable.

So why not consider adding your sukkah into Mr. Vorchheimer's directory [http://www.succah.aust.org/AddSuccah.htm]? Who knows, maybe one day your act of hospitality will help guide a traveller on the Jewish Highway right to your own sukkah's doorway.

Israel economy runs on i = (C x 2) + 10 percent

By JACK SILVERSTONE

I am no economist, nor am I any sort of statistician or mathematician. But after three weeks living in Israel with my family, not in a hotel, but in our own flat rented from a professor on a teaching exchange in the United States, I have devised a formula or equation for analyzing and describing the price of consumerism in the Jewish State.

Guest Voices

The formula is deceptively simple, yet seems, in the vast majority of cases, to be accurate. It is i = (C x 2) + 10 percent. That is, "i" stands for the cost of the item to be purchased. It doesn't really matter whether it is a soft drink, a box of facial tissues or lunch at one of the many fast-food restaurants proliferating throughout Israel. My formula seems to work with a fill-up at a gas station, payment to the electric company or a tube of toothpaste. If the item being purchased is packaged, refined, manufactured or imported, the formula holds.

If "i" stands for the item's cost, then "C" stands for the value of the Canadian dollar against the Israeli shekel, multiplied by 2. You then add 10 percent for good measure to determine the cost of your purchase.

In other words, just about everything in this extraordinary country costs a little more than double what it takes to purchase it in, say, Toronto or Montreal.

Now certainly there are exceptions in both directions to my neat little formula. You might find locally produced goods, such as wine, vegetables and bread, where instead of adding 10 percent after doubling the cost of the product, you might subtract it. I am willing to concede that sometimes the actual price might even be lower than in Canada. But this is more than offset by such exotic luxury goods as nail polish remover, name-brand sport shoes or deodorant.

Yet in this society, where consumerism is something of a secular religion, the restaurants are crowded, the traffic at almost all hours overwhelming and the specialty shops selling all manner of goods at a brisk pace. For the first time in my life, I collided with not one, but two individual and blissfully unconcerned shoppers carrying on animated conversation on their cellular phones while cruising the aisles of the supermarkets. Only in Israel, you say?

All this and more, despite salaries that are generally half those paid for comparable work in Canada and all manner of taxes that have to be paid, which are at least as high as our own and very often higher.

I will not even broach the subject of the astronomical housing prices in a country where 92 percent of the land is owned, in one way or another, by the state. Israel's new minister of trade, Natan Sharansky, at a briefing following the Toronto signing of the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement this August, noted that Tel Aviv now has the same per-square-foot cost as housing in Manhattan, but then added deadpan that his friends in New York usually have millions in their bank accounts, while those in Israel have similar balances — but in overdrafts!

Years ago, long before I had devised my formula, I raised the issue with an Israeli diplomat stationed in Canada of rampant consumerism without apparent sources of large amounts of cash. He was trained in business economics, and I therefore sought his wisdom. Over a pleasant lunch, he regaled me with explanations involving American loan guarantees, the balance of payments, war reparations, government and banking policies and the role of state enterprises.

Fascinating, of course. But after lunch, I was just as bewildered as I am now as to how this money reaches the hands of the average free-spending Israeli consumer. But then again, I'm no economist.

Canadians among Otzma participants

TORONTO – Four Canadians are among the 62 college students and recent college graduates representing 23 Jewish federations throughout North America who have been selected to spend a year in Israel as participants in Project Otzma.

Project Otzma is an early leadership identification program supported by the Council of Jewish Federations and participating federations. In Israel, Otzma is supported by the Israeli Forum, the Jewish Agency and the Youth and Hechalutz department of the World Zionist Organization.

Now in its 11th year, Project Otzma is designed to heighten Jewish identity and commitment and strengthen the bonds between North American communities and Israel through volunteer service.

The four Canadian Otzma participants, all from Toronto, are Adam Tizel, Eytan Szmuilowicz, Aviva Waxman and Brian Zeidenberg.

For additional information about the Otzma Program for the coming year, contact your local federation.

Pomson heading York U Jewish education program

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Alex Pomson

TORONTO — For someone who more or less stumbled into a career in Jewish education, Alex Pomson has landed firmly on his feet. The 32-year-old native of London, England, arrived in Toronto in August to spearhead York University's Jewish Teacher Education program. He is the first professor of Jewish Education at a Canadian university.

The combined BA/B.Ed. program, established 15 years ago, is unique in Canada and probably in the Diaspora in that graduating students are qualified to teach both Jewish and general studies in Jewish or public schools.

"To me the major advantage is that they understand both sides of the students' educational experience. That makes them better teachers," says Stan Shapson, dean of York's Faculty of Education, under whose auspices the program is run.

Since its inception, the program has been run by Michael Brown, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, and Martin Lockshin, associate professor of Humanities and Hebrew. There are now 29 students in the program, of whom 10 were accepted this year. Graduates have a placement rate of about 90 percent, said Brown.

The search for a professor of education began a few years ago and was made possible by the Israel Koschitzky Family Foundation, which has established an endowment of $600,000 at York in Jewish Education.

"It's a tiny [academic] field," says Brown. "There are fewer than 20 professors of Jewish education in all of North America, and none in Canada other than Alex."

With a background in academic research and teaching as well as in the day school classroom, Pomson has both a theoretical and practical understanding of the issues facing Jewish educators.

Most recently he spent three years as deputy head of school (equivalent to vice-principal) and head of Jewish studies at King Solomon High School, which opened in 1993. Concurrently, he was a research tutor at the University of London's Institute of Education.

Ten years ago it looked like Pomson was headed for a career in Marketing. Although he had become a national mazkir (director) for youth organization Bnei Akiva following his graduation in History from Cambridge University, "the theory was, I would get it out of my system and return to the real world."

He applied to "sensible institutions" and was offered a position by a major company, but decided he much preferred to stay in Jewish education.

Over the following decade he qualified as a teacher, spent two years teaching in London and a further two years in Israel on a Jerusalem Fellowship (a program to develop leadership for Jewish education in the Diaspora), then completed his PhD in Religious Education at the University of London.

The program Pomson now heads has "blazed a trail in the context of North American Jewish education," he says. He is looking at ways of developing the program further, such as instituting a post-graduate degree program in Jewish education and promoting research within Jewish schools.

Over the last 20 years there has been a resurgence in Jewish education, with a proliferation in the number of Jewish schools in the English-speaking world, Pomson notes.

His own research has included work on the influence of Jewish schooling on students from diverse Jewish backgrounds.

The relationship between Jewish education and Jewish continuity is a hot topic for Jewish educators today, but Pomson doesn't see it as a distinctly Jewish concern. "In the context where less money is available, I wouldn't see the Jewish world unusually hung up on the question of effectiveness. There's more accountability across the board."

He cautions, however, that it could take 20 years before an answer is reached. What is probably of more immediate interest, he suggests, is to help teachers develop the short-term tools to gauge the effectiveness of their teaching.

"There's more than enough to do," he says.

Funeral business a 'mitzvah' for young Toronto rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Working in the funeral services industry may seem an uncomfortable choice, especially for a young man.

But Rabbi Chaskel Zionce, 28, sees it as a tremendous mitzvah.

"Hazal (the sages) call it chesed shel emet, a mitzvah for which there can be no real payment. The person can't return the favor, or even smile or say thank you."

Of course, he added during an interview with The CJN, all mitzvot should be done that way.

Zionce is a Torontonian, now a Thornhill resident, who went to Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

"Our home was always modern Orthodox and shomer Shabbat," he said. But it was at CHAT he discovered the world of the Bobover Chassidim, a world he has embraced, along with, he says with a twinkle, that of the Bostoner rebbe. "It's half and half," he explained.

He studied at the Bobover yeshivah in New York, also becoming part of the chevra kadisha of the Vaad Harabonim of Queens, which is run by Rabbi Elchonon Zohn.

Rabbi Zohn's chevra kadisha is a paid body since its members are too busy to assume another position and is a going concern, Rabbi Zionce said, performing an average of three funeral preparations a day for men alone, and often more.

"There can be 11 or 12 after Shabbes," he said, and the chevra kadisha can be busy all night.

Rabbi Zohn, Rabbi Zionce said, is a leading authority in the field. "He mastered a system of preparing bodies for burial where there is no needless waste of time. The staff are trained to do things quickly and efficiently."

But speed and efficiency are not substitutes for caring about what is being done. "[Preparations for] each niftar (deceased person) are done perfectly."

When Rabbi Zionce decided to return to Toronto with his wife, Sara Rachel, and two young sons, he took Rabbi Zohn's teachings to his new position as the religious staff person of Hebrew Basic Burial.

If there are several funerals at once, he makes sure he supervises everything to ensure it's all done properly.

Rabbi Zionce takes his job seriously, as, he says, his clients do.

"When people are preparing a funeral, they often want things done the traditional way, even if they aren't traditional themselves. Maybe it's because the mother or father who died would have wanted it that way, or maybe because people at that time find it comforting."

Alpha Omega dentists hold reunion

By CINDY WAXER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Some 400 dentists joined together at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue recently to discuss social issues, swap business cards and kibbitz at the Alpha Omega International Dental Fraternity's annual gala.

Founded in 1907, Alpha Omega was created to provide a brotherhood for Jewish dental students who were not permitted to join other fraternities and whose numbers were limited by university program enrolment quotas.

"Alpha Omega Fraternity played a major part in opening up more doors for Jewish students," recalls Dr. Morton Silverberg, a member since the 1960s.

Today, the fraternity represents over 15,000 Jewish dentists and dental students and consists of more than 125 alumni and student chapters throughout North America, Europe, Israel, South Africa, Russia, Australia and South America.

Over the years, Alpha Omega has expanded its original purpose of combating systemic anti-Semitism and begun to address social issues.

The fraternity's philanthropic branch, the Alpha Omega Foundation, has granted over $12 million in aid to dental schools, clinics and international projects geared towards dental health, scholarships and research grants.

Internationally, the foundation has advocated excellence in dental education by generating funds for the Hadassah School of Dental Medicine in Jerusalem and the Maurice and Gabriela Goldschleger School of Dental Medicine in Tel Aviv. In Toronto, the fraternity helped raise funds to create a dental clinic in the Baycrest Centre.

Just as Alpha Omega's mission has been modified over time, so has its definition of the word fraternity. Fifteen percent of the organization's members are now women, as was evident in this year's gala attendance.

"Maybe I was a little intimidated at first, but as I keep attending, there are more women every year," said Dr. Effrat Habsha, a female fraternity member.

Seemingly unaffected by the contradiction, international president of Alpha Omega, Dr. Max Cutler, said, "We have a situation where even though we use the word fraternity, our more accurate term is Alpha Omega International."

But although objectives and nomenclature vary, Alpha Omega's annual gala remains committed to certain fundamental principles. The president of the Toronto Alumni Chapter, Dr. Steven Corber, staunchly regards these as the preservation of Judaism, high professional standards and community networking.

However, those who were present at this year's event have a grander vision of Alpha Omega's role.

The fraternity "keeps our friendships going, helps us keep our technology education going and our Judaism going; and the dinners are good too," said member Dr. Edward Reiter.

Meals on Wheels rolling on the right path

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Thirty years ago when Kosher Meals on Wheels started, only 40 meals a week were delivered. Today, with 200 volunteers taking part, the figure has risen to 1,100.

These eagerly awaited meals are delivered all over the Greater Toronto Area, from the lakeshore north to Richmond Hill, from Scarborough on the east to Etobicoke on the west. This past year 10 to 15 requests from York Region have been granted.

The six groups who pioneered Kosher Meals on Wheels are being honored at the Wagman Centre by Senior Care Sept. 26, along with other volunteers.

There have been many changes in the well-known service over 30 years. In 1966, clients paid from 40 to 70 cents a meal on a sliding scale; today they pay from $3.50 to $5.75. Now there is a dairy meal delivered every Tuesday and a non-meat meal (though prepared in a meat kitchen) available on Thursdays to accommodate changing tastes.

"We are attempting to add variety and make the meals more interesting," said Arnold Foss, volunteer programs and development supervisor. "For awhile the number of meals delivered was decreasing but now that the Ontario government has cut back on the homemaker program they are going up again."

Kosher Meals on Wheels has an attraction to senior volunteers because from a Jewish perspective the delivery of meals gives a special satisfaction, Foss said. Though most meals are taken to seniors, requests from younger people with physical or emotional problems are also granted. Most recipients live alone, though many couples are also on the list. Until recently, a Kosher Meal on Wheels was being delivered to a resident in her late 90s.

The groups being honored and those accepting the plaques are: Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Martin Storm, treasurer; Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, Fern Orzech, chair, volunteer development; Jewish Family and Child Service, Joan Stevens, volunteer coordinator on behalf of Michael Bowman, president; Jewish Women's International, Barbara Swimmer, president; National Council of Jewish Women, Gita Arnold, chair; Hebrew Weston Charitable Service.

The Marie and Jack Freedman Memorial Award goes to Alan Dessau, a founding member of Senior Care and president of Senior Care Foundation, while the Sam Rotman Humanitarian Award is being presented to Norda and Abe Berlin, longtime volunteers. In addition, awards are being given to volunteers with 10 and 20 years service, and to volunteers representing each of the agency's programs, Kosher Meals on Wheels, Volunteer Visiting, Intergenerational, Escort-Transportation and Hospice.

Wolfe Fellowship recipient delves into Agnon's writings

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Sharon Green

TORONTO — Even after writing a 330-page PhD thesis on the topic, Sharon Green finds the work of Hebrew writer S.Y. Agnon "endlessly fascinating."

As the recipient of this year's Ray D. Wolfe Fellowship in Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto, Green is teaching a third-year undergraduate course, Contemporary Israeli Literature in Translation, in the department of Near and Middle Eastern civilizations. The fellowship will also allow her to prepare for publication her doctoral thesis on the problem of love in Agnon's work.

Green is currently on leave from her other U of T teaching responsibilities. A lecturer in the department of Germanic languages and literature, she has taught Introduction to Yiddish Literature as well as University College's Writing Workshop and she coordinated the Yiddish Studies program from 1994 to 1996.

Because she wanted to feature a representative spectrum of Israeli literature in her new course, Green has included only one story by Agnon: Agunot, the one that made him famous and inspired his Hebrew surname. (Born Samuel Josef Czaczkes in 1888 in Galicia, Agnon immigrated to Palestine in 1907: his early writings were in Yiddish as well as Hebrew.)

Unfortunately, Agnon "isn't always that good in translation," said Green in a recent interview. Much of his writing style lends itself better to Hebrew, she believes.

Regardless of the importance of the literature in the original Hebrew, Green didn't include any works in the course unless they came across well in English. "I want the students to be excited about what they're reading."

Green, who was tutored in Hebrew as a young child and didn't study it again until university, finds the language rich in nuance. "It has so many layers to it that each word has many allusions. There are all kinds of echoes of past centuries in the language."

Green honed her Hebrew language skills in Israel in 1978, when she took a summer graduate program run by the Jewish Theological Seminary. A native of Toronto, she began her studies at U of T but received her three degrees from Brandeis, which awarded her the fellowship to travel to Israel at that time to interview Israeli authors Aharon Megged, David Shahar and A.B. Yehoshua.

Green and her husband of 17 years, Kenneth Green, who also teaches in U of T's Jewish Studies program, returned here in 1985. Having completed her PhD coursework, Green worked on her thesis "slowly but surely" as her family grew. Now a mother of three boys, she graduated in May.

School enrolment increases

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG – The Jewish school system here is more than holding its own for the 1996-97 school year.

As has been the case in recent years, Ramah Hebrew School, the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education's (WBJE) elementary school in south Winnipeg has, with just under 400 students registered, about three times as many students as the Talmud Torah-I.L. Peretz School (TTILP), its north end counterpart.

Nonetheless, TTILP's enrolment is up slightly, with over 130 in its junior kindergarten to Grade 6 program.

The big difference in the WBJE's school population this year is at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate. Whereas most classes at Joseph Wolinsky lose students from year to year, this year's Grade 10 class actually has more students – 60 as compared to 49 – than last year. Overall, student numbers are up about 25. Registration has closed at 293 students.

This is the last year the three schools will continue in their present form. Next September, Joseph Wolinsky and Ramah will be moving into the new Jewish Community Campus which is being built in south Winnipeg.

The building which currently houses Joseph Wolinsky, Talmud Torah and the Beth Jacob Synagogue is up for sale and will be closed on June 30, 1997, whether or not a buyer has been found.

The current plan for the north end elementary students is that the JK to Grade 4 students will move to a renovated area at the north Winnipeg Rosh Pina Synagogue – if enough parents register their children. Next year's north end Grade 5 and 6 students would attend a Middle Years program (grades 5 to 8) on campus.

Parents have to register their children for the Rosh Pina and Campus schools by the end of October. The north end parents have been told that they must have at least 70 children registered for the Rosh Pina school by that date if the school is to open.

The Winnipeg Jewish Community Council is prepared to invest $60,000, supplemented by government grants, in building classrooms at the Rosh Pina. If there are not enough children for a JK-4 at the synagogue, the BJE is also willing to consider a JK to Grade 1 program.

In the Hebrew bilingual programs in the public school systems in Winnipeg, enrolment is much the same as last year but with a somewhat different south-north ratio.

Regina gets new spiritual leader

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

REGINA – The small Jewish community in Regina, Sask., has been able to replace its spiritual leader, Rabbi Solomon Truzman, who left in early August to take a rabbinical posting in Little Rock, Ark.

The new religious leader for the 140-member Beth Jacob Synagogue is Samuel Linkovsky, most recently of the Agudat Israel Synagogue in Ottawa.

Although Linkovsky at this point is only a cantor, Leo Morgan, the president of the Beth Jacob Synagogue, says that he aspires to the rabbinate and plans to receive his smichah.

"We feel fortunate to have him," Morgan says.

Born in Russia and raised in Israel, Linkovsky is a fourth generation chazzan who served in several congregations in the United States before going to the 800-member Conservative Agudat Israel in Ottawa in 1994.

He has signed a two-year contract with the Beth Jacob Synagogue here.

Cantor aims to boost awareness of Hebrew U in Ottawa

OTTAWA — Marcia Cantor is a woman with a new objective — to bring an awareness of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem to the Ottawa community.

Cantor is the new president of the Ottawa chapter of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU), succeeding Dorothy Nadolny who served as chapter president for several years.

People are unaware of what the Hebrew University has to offer, Cantor says, "not only to ourselves, but to our children. For example, the programs offered at the university's Rothberg School for Overseas Students and the Melton Centre for Jewish Education in the Diaspora play a major role in ensuring Jewish continuity.

Cantor's connection with the Hebrew University began a few years ago. As a board member of Children and Adults with Attention Deficit Disorder (CAADD Canada Inc.), she started to correspond with Tom Gumpel, a lecturer at the university's School of Education who specializes in Attention Deficit Disorder. In July 1995, following their eldest son Jeremy's bar mitzvah, the Cantor family visited Israel and the Hebrew University.

"In honor of his bar mitzvah, Jeremy chose to make a donation to the School of Special Education at the university," Cantor says.

I BELIEVE

I BELIEVE that the promotion of our shared heritage through the arts is a cornerstone of this community.

Our Jewish heritage must remain an integral part of our Jewish life. Our heritage establishes common bonds and captures our collective imagination. It strengthens our Jewish identity. We must support our heritage, we must nurture it, and we must celebrate it.

I believe that UJA Federation is the most efficient means of ensuring that what we value — as a Jewish community — is translated into effective action. Now. And always.

Gerald Schwartz

Through its support of community institutions and programs, UJA Federation ensures that our Jewish heritage is expressed in our everyday life. At summer camps and in youth groups. In festivals for Jewish film and Jewish book fairs. In exhibitions of Jewish art and lectures by Jewish thinkers.

But for all we have in place, the community hungers for more. Resources can come from only one place: Our community. Each and every one of us.

FOR OUR COMMUNITY. FOR ISRAEL.
FOR OUR CHILDREN. FOREVER.

Separatists continue to mess things up

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — When it comes to trying to get along with the Jewish community, no matter how hard they try, the separatists mess it up every time.

Parti Québécois (PQ) Cultural Affairs Minister Camille Laurin used to go around Montreal saying he was looking for "a chief rabbi" he could talk to about the French language issue.

Earlier this year, overzealous fonctionnaires ordered Passover food off the store shelves, even though religious food is exempt under the Quebec language law. The PQ later apologized, but not before the harm had been done.

The Galganov Affair is the latest incident.

Bloc Québécois leader Michel Gauthier was meeting with the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) the other day. It's normal for federal party leaders to meet with special interest groups before the start of each session. Nothing unusual there.

So what does Gauthier do? He asks the CJC if it would mind publicly disassociating itself from Howard Galganov and his remarks describing Quebec separatists as "bastards."

It appears the request was made in all innocence — or ignorance. Gauthier even announced on his own to reporters what he'd requested, as he emerged from his meeting with the CJC.

Gauthier would have been able to report to Premier Lucien Bouchard that even Galganov's own people had turned against him. Bouchard would be pleased.

Gauthier knew the CJC didn't approve of Galganov's in-your-face approach to language issues. And the CJC hardly goes around calling anyone "bastards," least of all half the Quebec population.

And didn't the CJC publicly denounce Mordecai Richler when he wrote in an American magazine five years ago that Quebecers were anti-Semitic?

Gauthier likely never realized that what he did smacked of the worst sort of ethnic stereotyping.

He was in fact saying: "Galganov is Jewish. You guys are Jewish. You crack down on him for us."

Gauthier was saying, in effect, that the CJC is responsible for every Jew in Quebec.

The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith accused Gauthier of the kind of "ethnocentrism and chauvinism that poisons the separatist vision" and demanded his immediate resignation.

"Gauthier exposes the pretense of many separatists, who on one day claim that we are all Quebecers and on the next day call on an ethno-religious group to denounce the political activities of an individual who just happens to share that religious background," said B'nai Brith Quebec chair Allan Adel.

Alliance Quebec president Michel Hamelin called it "a scurrilous attack" on Galganov's religious background.

The CJC explained that when it went after Richler, it was not because he was Jewish, but because he had spoken out about anti-Semitism in Quebec, an issue which it knows something about.

Presumably the CJC felt no similar expertise on the paternity of separatists.

Trying to link Galganov to the CJC or making a point of his Jewishness was not only offensive, but it was irrelevant to the debate, because unlike Richler, Galganov, even at the height of his anger, has always kept religion out of it, and never even suggested, as Richler did, that anti-Semitism was a motive for anything to do with language.

Gauthier could have cooled everything down, but instead he stood his ground, saying his request was reasonable, because Galganov was talking about "human rights" and the CJC is involved in human rights. So are a lot of other Quebec organizations involved in human rights and Gauthier never asked them to get involved.

Gauthier compounded his error by suggesting that the CJC "perhaps has an interest ... to clearly explain that they never mandated Mr. Galganov to speak in their name."

He did not elaborate.

It is difficult to imagine what that "interest" could be based upon, to what it might refer. It showed ignorance or at best insensitivity.

The only possible explanation could be that Gauthier was referring obliquely to a newspaper article a few days earlier in La Presse.

Gilles Paquin, a tough investigative reporter, wrote an article pointing out Galganov's past as a member of Rabbi Meir Kahane's Jewish Defence League (JDL) almost two decades ago.

Paquin noted that Galganov was accusing Quebecers of "ethnic nationalism," when he himself had once belonged to an ethnic nationalistic movement so extreme that it is "banned in Israel."

Paquin even found a university professor, John Siegler, at Carleton University, who said that in his opinion, Galganov was using JDL-style tactics against the Quebec government.

Perhaps Gauthier meant the CJC should say something before things got more out of hand.

Once again, a separatist leader had set out to try to achieve a closer understanding between separatists and the Quebec Jewish community, and ended up making things worse than ever.

We can almost imagine Bouchard's opening line when Gauthier reported back to his boss: "Say Michel, how did your meeting with the Jews go the other day?"

Galganov planning political showdown

ly out of pocket over $100,000, not to mention the money he has lost in his advertising business because he has spent so much time fighting separatists.

Galganov, 46, sees this as a campaign, that will only end when the PQ is "defeated." He refers to separatists as "the enemy ... If Canada had such an enemy from the outside, we'd be assembling the troops." As far as he's concerned, there's nothing to debate with people out to "destroy my country."

Galganov admits he is obsessed. "When I wake up in the morning thinking about separation and cultural exclusion, and go to bed thinking the same, I know it's not healthy."

He revels in the advance media attention his New York trip got in the rest of Canada. "It's the most successful public relations coup I ever had, because it's the first time in 20 years or more the Quebec debate became a national issue."

The last few weeks have only made him more truculent. He terms La Presse's harping on his having been involved with the Jewish Defence League (JDL) as "anti-Semitic" and " a form of intimidation," but instructive.

"People like [journalist Gilles] Paquin think because of our ethnicity and culture, we are lesser Quebecers or citizens. This is a warning bell all should listen to."

Galganov insists there is "no French culture in Quebec; there is a Quebec culture and we're all part of it, whether they like it or not."

Howard Galganov

His maverick style has its roots in his background. His family was poor, he said, and he grew up in the Fairmount/Hutchison area, before moving to Laval West. His late father Eddy was decorated for his army service in World War II.

Although the family was not religious, Galganov attended the Lubavitch yeshivah for a few years and thought about becoming a rabbi. Galganov dropped out of high school and has been working since age 12. He later finished high school at night.

Surfing the net

By Jay Brodbar

Everyone knows about the Internet. It's sexy and cool. Communicate with your friends in Tel Aviv or London, for next to nothing. Download the latest track from your favorite pop star and listen to it, thanks to "the Net." From TV spots to business cards, a Web address (typically starting with the ubiquitous www) identifies its owner as being cutting edge.

Jonathan Grossman, Bob Cherniak and Jennifer Cohen are three of the volunteers who helped create Jewish Toronto.

Glitz and hype aside, we at UJA Federation, see the Internet as a powerful and growing tool for local community building, information dissemination and communication. Starting last summer, we set our sights on building a Web site for the Jewish community which would be a central starting point for finding anything and everything that is Jewish in cyberspace. A virtual Jewish community centre where people could hang out and chat.

If you have access to the Internet, check us out at http://www.feduja.org. We'll be growing and changing as the months progress.

If you'd like to get involved, drop us a line at the site. We are building for the future. Visit, and, as we get more interactive, join us. Make Jewish Toronto yours! •

UJA FEDERATION
UNITED JEWISH APPEAL • JEWISH FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

A Message To Toronto's Young Leadership

This year, as always, our goal at UJA Federation is to conduct a stronger campaign to meet the rising needs of our Jewish communities, here in Toronto, in Israel and around the world. Funding everywhere has been cut and our agencies require greater support in order to maintain services so greatly in demand.

This year, our approach to improving the campaign has changed somewhat. We are focusing on those who have never been involved before, because involvement leads to commitment. Once someone is aware of UJA Federation's centrality to the Jewish community; once someone receives essential information, he or she understands the importance of supporting the campaign.

That's one of the goals of in T.O. - to help you, the young adult members of Toronto's Jewish population, connect with the community. We hope in T.O. will help make you aware of community issues.

We encourage you to explore all that it offers you. Ask questions, get involved and get in T.O. UJA Federation.

David Goldstein
1997 Campaign Chairman

From ordinary printer to innovative marketer

By Russell Goldstein

When you ask David Engel, Vice-Chairman of the 1997 UJA Federation Campaign, what he does, he will tell you that he is a printer. It sounds reasonable enough. Ontario has the third largest concentration of printers in North America and the industry is one of the largest employers in the province. Given that, it might surprise you to know that Engel has only three employees and doesn't even own a printing press.

Engel is probably better described as a print consultant who relies on an extensive background in printing, combined with a unique understanding of the latest printing technology for his livelihood.

Like the high-quality pieces that he produces, his expertise comes at a premium, although that doesn't appear to deter his clients. His company, Innovative Graphics Inc., generated $15 million in revenue last year, producing printed material for brand-name companies like Procter & Gamble and Bell Canada. "Companies call me when they want to do something unconventional," says an enthusiastic Engel, who is usually hired to help with new product launches. "I source the latest printing technology and apply innovative approaches to printing projects."

Chances are some of David Engel's work has been mailed to your home. In addition to being the communicator of Bell's Real Plus long distance plan, he was instrumental in developing several Tide laundry detergent print campaigns. He is particularly proud of a direct mail piece that compared strips of cloth washed with the latest version of Tide to the same material washed by ordinary detergent.

In order to get the job done, he relies on a web of strategic alliances with printers and advertising agencies to create his version of the "virtual corporation." Because no two projects are the same, it's a constant challenge to assemble the right team for a job.

How did he learn all of this? Engel cites his father as the primary influence in the way he does business. Originally from Montreal, Engel, 40, worked in his father's printing company (Metro Graphics) for 17 years. To this day, David feels the lessons learned from his father contributed to the success he has enjoyed to date.

Three years ago, Engel decided it was time to spread his own wings, so he created Innovative Graphics and his own market niche.

David Engel has been a part of UJA Federation since his arrival in Toronto with his wife, Judy, and their 3 children, almost 13 years ago. It has, he claims, been one of the most important factors shaping his social life in the city. "While I spend much time with UJA Federation," he explains, "I have gotten far more out of it than what I have put in."• Israel...Never Can Say Goodbye...

By Julie Morton

Israel is a land which never fails to fascinate me, and fill my ears with lovely siren songs urging me to go back. I have spent over a year and a half of my life in this cauldron of emotion and have just recently returned to the relative sanity of Canada. The realities of the two very different countries collide within my being like schizophrenic personalities, each vying for the dominance of my heart and my mind.

SHOPPING

Let's start with the shopping. (I figure that as a young yuppie princess, shopping is a fitting place to start my discussion about Israel).

The average store is quite small. Nevertheless, it is what fills the store that is so delightful. I passed one the other day which is a perfect case in point. It was probably 300 square feet, and in this space, it offered the savvy consumer used tools, stationery, and some bruised fruits and vegetables. You know, one stop shopping for everything you just might need. There was no rhyme or reason to what was carried. There was no order to its display. And most of all, customer service is a completely foreign concept.

PARKING

To continue. Parking. There are no parking meters in the country. Rather a convoluted system of street parking has evolved. Painted on the side of the road are a series of colored markings dictating when and where you can park. Red and blue striped lines mean no parking is allowed at any time; white stripes indicate you can park for free after 7; and white and blue stripes allow you to park until 5 with a series of one hour cards. You scratch off the time, date and hour for which the cards will be valid. Are you still following me? If you are going to park for more than an hour, you simply line up more of these cards in the front window of your car. Now, if you can't find a parking place, and invariably you can't, you simply ignore all the rules and pull up onto the nearest curb.

SQUISHING

What else?...no one smiles in the street. I miss that. Part of the problem is so many people squished into such a little country that the bubble of private space surrounding each person is microscopically small.

WAITING

The concept of an orderly line is simply beyond them. I, on the other hand, want to line up, in orderly fashion, for absolutely everything. Bennie, my banker, finally told me it didn't matter if the woman cutting in front of me was 104, bent over, arthritic, and shuffling along with a walker. I should just elbow her out of my way or I'd never accomplish anything in Israel. It was then that I knew that I'd be forever doomed here.

LIVING

Life cycles abide in Israel as they do anywhere else, except for one thing - everyone knows he or she could die at a moment's notice. Life is short and Israelis know how to live it well. Thus, few individuals work terribly long or hard hours. Banks give monthly credit for up to four times an individual's earned monthly salary. Consequently, everybody lives off the earning power of next month's paycheck. Dinners start late and last for hours. The midnight shows are booked solid throughout the week, even though most individuals have to be at work at 8 or 8:30 the next morning.

Julie Morton and her husband Ron O'Brien in Israel.

HOSTING

Despite their rough and tumble exterior, the Israelis I met were never less than absolutely hospitable. Each and everyone, from the man who owns the kiosk where I would buy my daily papers, to friends of friends of friends who heard that I was living there, called to ask me home for dinner. Never have I been to a place where the welcome wagon was driven out so often and with such warmth.

On the whole, Israel is like a complex, grainy and unpolished, although somehow luminescent, semi-precious stone. It has value and great worth; however, one must look beneath the scabrous exterior to fully appreciate it. And, once seen, the beauty inherent in the country and the people will be forever imprinted on your heart and mind. ♦

Dragon What?

By Elisa Morton Palter

Guess what the world's fastest growing watersport is! The world's fastest growing watersport, gaining participants at an astounding rate of 30-40% a year, with over 2 million loyal followers to date, is Dragon Boat Racing.

Never heard of it? Read on...

Dragon boats owe their origin to the historic suicide of Qu Yuan, a Chinese poet and Minister of State from the 4th century B.C.E. Qu Yuan's crusade against political corruption got him ousted from his post, and forced him into exile. In despair, he drowned himself, and tradition says that local fishermen raced out in their boats to find him, slapping the water to keep the fish away from his body. A tradition was created when the search for Qu Yuan was ritually re-enacted annually. Today the Dragon Boat festival, (held this year, June 15th) is the second most important public holiday in China.

Brought to Canada in 1986 by a group of Hong Kong business people, Dragon Boating became an immediate hit on our side of the world too. The visually spectacular sport involves a team of 22 participants: 20 paddlers, a steerperson and a drummer (for pacing), who sit two by two down the length of a 12 metre boat decorated at the front with a large carved dragon head. The races are heated and often very close, making for exciting photo finishes.

...No stars and bench warmers. The team is everything...

Dragon Boating is a sport that can be learned by men or women of any age, and any fitness level. The teams are usually mixed (at least 8 women) and can actually become competitive in only 3-4 practices. It's even possible for someone to pick up Dragon Boating late in life and not be at a competitive disadvantage compared with someone who started younger.

Best of all, it's a sport in which there are no stars and no bench warmers. The team is everything, and the team is actually compromised when one person tries to be better, faster, stronger than the rest. Individual expertise plays a distant second to the importance of team cohesiveness in determining the outcome of a race. In fact, a perfectly synchronized women's team is not only exciting to watch, but almost always beats a physically stronger, less coordinated men's team.

In 1988, the Toronto Chinese Business Association brought the sport to T.O., and until fairly recently, those involved were mostly Asian. Mike Kerkmann and Barbara Goldberg aim to change all that.

Mike has been involved in Dragon Boating for nearly ten years both as a paddler (he is in the elite category) and, more recently, as a boat builder who saw the sport's potential. Barbara, an excellent athlete, has built a successful event management business. A mutual friend put Barbara and Mike in touch and together they have made it their goal to bring Dragon Boating to the masses.

Last year, Goldberg and Kerkmann launched a major event series in Toronto called The Great White North Dragon Boat Challenge. It was a great success, repeated this year on September 21 & 22. Dragon Boating is also expected to be approved as an Olympic demonstration sport for the year 2000.

Remember I told you that it doesn't take long to become competitive? Well, if you start now, you should be ready just in time!♦

Dragon Boating depends on precision teamwork.

Ottawa students learn how to make a shofar

By MIRIAM VALE
CJN Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – Making your own shofar is easier than blowing one.

That is what 140 students at Maimonides Hebrew Day School here learned earlier this month, as part of a new educational program designed to teach children about Rosh Hashanah using a hand-on approach.

The Shofar Factory is part of a series of programs about Jewish holidays to be introduced in Ottawa this academic year. Rabbi Menachem M. Blum, part-time teacher at Maimonides and organizer of the series, shows students how to make a shofar in about 30 minutes. He says the program has been very successful so far in educating the students.

"When the children see the shofar being made, they get more of a feeling and appreciation for the holiday," Blum says.

And the students like it too.

"I got to drill a hole in the shofar," says Elisheva Shaps, a Grade 1 student at Maimonides. "It was fun making it."

Drilling the hole for the mouth to blow into is only one of the steps in making a shofar. Before the presentation, Blum boils the ram's horn in hot water for about eight hours so the marrow in the horn is easily removable.

The students are also involved in sawing, drilling and sanding part of the shofar. When it is completed, Blum asks for volunteers to try to blow the shofar.

During the first grade presentation, none of the students were able to blow the shofar. Then Blum proceeded to blow it and explain the different sounds heard in synagogue on Rosh Hashanah. For example, one of the sounds, tekiah, is a long unbroken tune.

Also part of the Shofar Factory presentation are the questions Blum asks about the holiday and the importance of the shofar on Rosh Hashanah. He says the program can be easily adapted for any age group or audience.

Blum says he plans to bring the Shofar Factory to synagogues, community centres and other schools in Ottawa. For example, he plans to present it at Hillel Academy, another Hebrew day school, on the days between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

The Shofar Factory was first presented in the United States about eight years ago by the Lubavitch organization. Since then, it has been a regular part of the High Holy Day season. Blum moved from New York to introduce the program to Ottawa. The Shofar Factory has been well received by local educators.

Prof. Gerald Cammy, principal of Maimonides, says it will now be a part of the curriculum.

"It's a necessary hands-on approach to studying Judaism," says Cammy. "The holiday means more to children if they know what is happening at synagogue."

Blum says students will also participate in a menorah building program for Chanukah and matzah baking for Passover.

Finestone planning to seek fourth term

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Sheila Finestone ended speculation about her intentions when she announced she will seek a fourth term as member of Parliament for Mount Royal.

She said at the Mount Royal Liberal Riding Association, "without equivocation, that if I am asked to stand for election, to represent the people of Mount Royal as I have over the past 12 years, I will respond in a positive manner."

Sheila Finestone

Finestone's future has been the subject of rumor for months since she was dropped from the position of secretary of state for multiculturalism and the status of women last January.

Finestone, who will be 70 in January, has held Mount Royal, one of the safest Liberal seats, since 1984. There were media reports last winter that she was being urged to resign to make way for a "star" candidate, like lawyer Eric Maldoff. (Maldoff firmly denied that at the time.)

"I cannot abandon all of those people who have come to depend on me and my office for the help and service and advice that we have been able to offer since 1984," said Finestone, who received a standing ovation when she made the announcement.

"My contributions to Montreal, Quebec, Canada and the party are on record, and I will face any opponent with that record as testimony to my ability to serve."

Finestone used the occasion to lambaste the Parti Québécois (PQ) government for heightening tensions between anglophones and francophones.

"The olive branch extended at the Centaur Theatre [Premier Lucien Bouchard's address to anglophones in March] has been replaced with the tape measure and the return of the language police ...

"We are being told to obey the law, but if we obey the law too much and ask for English on store signs as is allowed under the law and upheld by the Supreme Court, then we're told we're too provocative and they'll change the law. We've disturbed the linguistic peace for asking that our basic human rights be respected," she said.

Without being specific, she congratulated "grassroots organizations" for speaking out for Canada and their rights.

She regretted that French-Canadian federalists are too "intimidated" to speak out for "fear of repercussions against themselves and their businesses. This is anathema to a democratic society."

Finestone said she finds it "deceiving and disturbing" that the PQ "thinks it can selectively choose which parts of the law to enforce and which to ignore."

Quebec Justice Minister Paul Begin should resign or be fired for his dismissal of the Superior Court ruling in favor of Guy Bertrand that separation must be in accordance with the Constitution, she said.

"Mr. Begin has effectively announced that the rule of law only applies when it suits his purpose ... Surely, even if we differ on the question of separation, there is no difference in a civil and democratic society as the interpretation of the rule of law."

Mount Sinai surgeon works on Crohn's research

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Dr. Zane Cohen

TORONTO — Dr. Zane Cohen is surgeon in chief at Mount Sinai Hospital and a professor in the department of surgery at the University of Toronto. But one of his major interests is in inflammatory bowel disease, which includes Crohn's disease and ulcerative colitis.

Both are chronic diseases of the bowel system, but while Crohn's disease can affect any portion of the digestive system from the mouth to the anus, ulcerative colitis attacks the colon and the rectum.

They tend to appear, Cohen said in an interview, from the late teens to the 30s, occasionally also appearing in the 60s, although, he said, pediatric cases are not unknown.

Symptoms include chronic, sometimes bloody diarhhea and severe pain. Ulcerative colitis can be cured surgically, but care for Chrohn's disease is only symptomatic, including drug therapy and surgery.

Current research suggests there is a strong genetic component, with 10 to 15 percent of patients reporting someone else in the family having one or the other illness.

Jews have a proportionally high rate, especially of Crohn's disease, Cohen said, which seems to agree with the genetic theory.

Mount Sinai, he explained, is involved in a research project on this very theory, together with the Whitehead Institute at Harvard University in Boston.

"We think that several genes are involved, and one or more genes might have to be affected for a person to get one of these diseases," Cohen said.

Cohen is working on the research project with Mount Sinai surgeon Dr. Robin McLeod and physicians Gordon Greenberg, Hillary Steinhart and Kathy Siminovitch; Shelly Bull, from the University of Toronto's department of statistical analysis and the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute; and Dr. Tom Hudson of the Whitehead Insitute at Harvard University.

Funding is provided by the hospital, private sources and peer review granting agencies.

"We are taking blood from both affected and non-affected members of families and sending it to Boston. We are looking for linkages, where certain gene combinations are present," Cohen said.

The results of the blood screening will be returned to Toronto and statistical analysis will be done at U of T.

They hope to have initial results by this winter, Cohen said.

Genetic research is also being done at Johns Hopkins and UCLA in the United States, at Oxford University in England, in France and in Australia. Interestingly, different places appear to be identifying different genes.

"This may be because of the different patient populations or because multiple genes may be involved," Cohen explained.

There are also studies being done on drugs, including Pentasa, an aspirin-like drug; Methotrexate, and Budesonide, to see if they delay recurrence of Crohn's disease symptoms.

Mount Sinai is the site of the Inflammatory Bowel Disease Centre, a 29-bed unit which offers medical and surgical care, but also an in- and out-patient lifestyle centre, where a dietician, social worker, psychiatrist, entrastomal therapist and psychologist help people deal with the diseases' difficult physical, psychological and social aspects.

There are also support groups run from the hospital and a resource centre.

One way to deal with ulcerative colitis is to surgically remove part of the colon and the rectum, and create a stoma, or opening in the abdomen, for waste to come through.

Mount Sinai is known for its work with the internal pelvic pouch, a device which eliminates the need for a stoma in some patients.

The IBD centre also offers professional education and public information nights.

In recognition of the hospital's work in the field, the United Ostomy Association of Canada is marking World Ostomy Day Oct. 5 by presenting proceeds from a fundraising raffle to Cohen at the hospital.

Weizmann explores new method of treating inflammatory disorders

REHOVOT — A potential method for treating rheumatoid arthritis, Crohn's disease and other chronic inflammatory disorders has been developed in an animal study conducted by researchers at the Weizmann Institute and Ben-Gurion University.

This approach may also be used to control excessive weight loss such as that occurring in cancer, AIDS and tuberculosis.

The method consists of a new delivery system that provides the organism with a steady supply of a natural therapeutic substance. It was developed by Prof. David Wallach of the Weizmann Institute together with Prof. Joseph Kost and graduate student Rom Eliaz of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

People with rheumatoid arthritis and other autoimmune disorders characterized by chronic inflammation produce increased amounts of tumor necrosis factor (TNF). While TNF normally kills diseased cells and controls inflammation, it can sometimes get out of hand, causing a variety of illnesses. High levels of TNF are also responsible for excessive disease-related weight loss.

Previous studies have shown that injecting soluble TNF receptors — free-floating molecules that bind with TNF — helps relieve the symptoms in human patients because the receptors absorb TNF.

But the benefits are short-lived, as these receptors are quickly cleared from the body. Attempts to keep them in the blood longer by modifying them prior to injection may fail because the organism is likely to perceive the modified molecules as foreign and develop antibodies against them.

In their research on mice suffering from rheumatoid arthritis and/or excessive weight loss, Wallach and colleagues managed to maintain a steady level of natural TNF receptors in the blood, thereby imitating the process that normally occurs in the body when it tries to ward off the knockout punches of TNF. They achieved this by developing a polymer delivery system that contains TNF receptors and continuously releases them in small amounts.

Mice remained free of symptoms for several weeks after receiving injections of polymer-coated TNF receptors, while those that did not receive the injections developed joint swelling, impaired leg movement or lethal weight loss.

In addition to being effective, this method is also economical because the costly TNF receptors are released gradually in very small amounts.

Centre for learning disabilities established

With an initial grant of $150,000 from Women's ORT in Israel, a centre for the diagnosis and care of students with dyslexia and other learning disabilities has been established.

The new centre will help thousands of students receive professional diagnosis, prepare for examinations, keep pace with their day-to-day schoolwork and ease their mainstreaming into regular classes. Thirteen consultants are presently being trained at Haifa University and each student will be matched with a trained volunteer for one-on-one assistance.

Israel downplays chance of early talks with Syria

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Peace talks with Syria are unlikely to resume in the near future, officials in Jerusalem said last week, after U.S. envoy Dennis Ross finished a three-day visit to the region.

Other officials reiterated that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu refuses to accept as binding previous unwritten understandings tied to the Golan, but only agrees that Israel is "willing to examine ideas" presented in the past.

The state-run Syrian media has suggested that if Netanyahu is not willing to accept previous understandings, there is little to discuss.

Officials admit that it is harder to make concessions to Damascus while Syria is engaging in threatening troop movements on the northern slopes of Mt. Hermon, since any concession would be viewed as yielding to pressure.

Ross departed from his usual habit on regional trips and decided not to visit Syria. Instead, after holding talks with officials in Egypt, the Palestinian Authority and Israel, Ross flew home.

It is not known if this was due to his belief that Damascus will not accept Netanyahu's formula for resumption of talks, or if – as some said – it may mark a form of U.S. displeasure with Syrian military redeployment in Lebanon and on Mt. Hermon.

Formally, the Ross trip was devoted to ensuring that the Cairo economic summit occurs on schedule in November, and to being briefed by Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai on plans for Hebron redeployment; so there was no need to visit Syria.

It should be noted that Secretary of State Warren Christopher is to meet Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Shara next week at the UN General Assembly, where they are expected to discuss resuming peace talks and Syrian troop movements.

In related developments, fierce fighting erupted in south Lebanon last week, after two Golani Brigade soldiers were killed and eight others wounded in a clash with Hezbollah gunmen near the northern perimeter of the security zone.

Lt. Tsur Parnas, 21, of Moshav Kidron, and Staff-Sgt. Zohar Mintz, 20, of Kiryat Bialik, were killed in the encounter.

At least three Hezbollah gunmen were believed to have been killed and a number of others wounded in the firefight.

The clash itself occurred near the IDF's Soujud position in the northeastern sector of the zone.

The Golani soldiers were on patrol when they encountered what appears to have been a squad of around a dozen Hezbollah gunmen.

OC Northern Command Maj.-Gen. Amiram Levine said the soldiers surprised the terrorists and opened fire.

The Golani soldiers apparently opened fire with machine guns and hurled grenades at the Hezbollah squad, and Parnas was killed in the initial exchange. The soldiers, however, continued to chase the gunmen, and Mintz was fatally wounded in the subsequent clashes.

IAF planes twice struck at Hezbollah bases, and helicopter gunships were also in action.

Military helicopter goes down at sea

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The navy succeeded last week in locating the acoustic beacon of a Dolphin helicopter that crashed at sea during a routine exercise, but it is on the sea floor at a 650-metre depth. Two of the helicopter's three crew members, Lt.-Col. Zion Bachar and Eran Gravia, the pilot and communications officer, are still missing.

It is assumed that the beacon, which is some 12 nautical miles east of Nahariya, is still attached to the helicopter, but the navy does not have the special equipment needed to lift the Dolphin from such a depth. It is seeking the services of a company that has such equipment to help it retrieve the helicopter, the army said.

The body of the navigator, Capt. Shahak Sela, 24, was located the day after the crash, but the other two have yet to be found and have been declared missing in action.

This was the second fatal helicopter crash the IAF has suffered within six months. Seven soldiers were killed when a Yasur 2000 transport helicopter crashed during a training exercise in the Judean Desert last March.

An inquiry is being conducted into the crash.

The air force said the Dolphin was in good condition, which raises the likelihood that the crash was due to pilot error. The helicopter did not emit any distress signals.

Speaking to military reporters, an IAF spokesperson said the IAF plans to replace its Dolphins with more advanced models that have larger engines. He said he all Dolphins would be ordered grounded, if it is determined that the crash resulted from a mechanical malfunction.

He said the Dolphin was well maintained and that weather conditions were favorable during the exercise. Wind velocity was low and the seas were calm.

The dangers of deterrence

problem and that of the democracies in the 1930s – even Anthony Eden once compared Nasser to Hitler – have combined to make deterrence a policy axiom since the establishment of the state.

The only real problem with the World War II model is that it doesn't describe every situation. Not all wars are caused by the failure to deter the aggressive intentions of hostile forces. Some result from a misreading of intentions, and from precautionary measures that are misinterpreted by the other side as a prelude to attack.

This leads to pre-emptive or preventive action which turns out, in retrospect, to have been unwarranted.

Of course, it is often difficult to know in advance which situation prevails and which strategy of war-avoidance is therefore more appropriate. But it is vital at the very least to be aware of the dangers of indiscriminately applying "lessons of history" to situations where they may not fit.

All of which brings us back to Syria. If Hafez al-Assad is Hitler and Syria is Nazi Germany, then an Israeli policy of deterrence based on credible threats is the most appropriate way to avoid war.

But this is a difficult analogy to make. The personalities are entirely different, as are the willingness to take risks and the ideological commitment. Most important, the relative resources and capabilities are entirely different.

There is therefore little reason to assume that Assad is bent on a conscious course of military confrontation with Israel. This conclusion should be qualified by two considerations.

Assad may believe that however slight his chances of recovering the Golan by military means, his prospects of doing so through negotiations are even worse. And the missiles at Assad's disposal may persuade him that he can deter Israel from escalating a war, thus limiting the risk he runs – but this safety net may soon disappear if Israel develops an effective anti-missile defence system.

Nevertheless, given global and regional developments, the Israeli-Syrian balance of forces and Assad's demonstrated record of prudence, there isn't much evidence to suggest that the World War II model is applicable to the Syrian-Israeli relationship, as it was in 1973.

The election of Benjamin Netanyahu was greeted in the Syrian media by a barrage of vitriolic propaganda; but Syria had been demonized by the Likud long before the election. It, not Iran, was identified as the primary villain in Lebanon, and threats to respond to Hezbollah attacks by hitting Syrian targets in Lebanon were followed by all kinds of loose speculation about "triple containment."

The heat was then turned up by what could only be inspired leaks, first about Scud-C tests and then about Syrian troop movements – as if to say publicly: "We know about all this, and if it goes too far, we won't repeat the mistake we made in 1973."

In this atmosphere, there is a serious danger that rhetorical escalation and measures and countermeasures meant to anticipate the imagined plans of the other side may result in loss of control. In particular, there is a risk that some flare-up in Lebanon will precipitate a slide into large-scale hostilities no one really intends.

Of course, minimal levels of vigilance and preparedness need to be maintained, but there is also an urgent need to end inflammatory rhetoric (and other sources of anxiety, such as televised reports of exercises and manoeuvres) and to use all channels of communication to convey reassuring messages.

Hebron pullout linked to security

By Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM – Israel Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat met last week for nearly four hours on the Palestinian side of the Erez checkpoint, in a bid to hammer out the principles of a Hebron redeployment agreement.

"I met today, for the first time, with [Arafat], the chairman, and a group of people from the Palestinian Authority," Mordechai said at their joint press conference after the meeting.

"We spoke in a serious and pertinent way on a number of issues. We decided that the [steering] committee will convene in the near future and will discuss details, and when it has in its hands the framework of an agreement, we will convene again and discuss further issues on the agenda."

He said he is linking easing the closure with a crackdown on terrorists. "We expect a further effort to tackle the problems still existing on the ground, to prevent unwanted actions and to strengthen security. As long as security is strengthened, we can advance with the processes themselves and do our utmost to ease and support the Palestinian Authority in those areas in which we can do so. I want to thank [Arafat] for hosting me," Mordechai said.

Arafat described the meeting as positive, but when asked if he had agreed to make any changes in the Hebron agreement, he said that "the steering committee will carry on all these details."

"Hebron is a very complicated subject," Mordechai said. "We are trying together to find the best solution for both sides and we will find it."

Looking stern as the meeting opened, Mordechai took Arafat's extended hand and held it for the photographers to snap their photos.

The Palestinian officials who joined Arafat at the meeting have said repeatedly that they will not accept any renegotiation of the Hebron redeployment. So the issue has been how to produce an agreement that will let Israel show it has improved security for Israelis in Hebron, while Arafat can show that it is essentially unchanged.

In related developments, Mordechai's approval of plans to build some 1,800 housing units in the haredi settlement of Mattityahu/Kiryat Sefer, located just over the Green Line in the Modi'in region, raised the ire of the Palestinian Authority, the United States and peace activists.

The State Department's Middle East coordinator Dennis Ross met with PA Chairman Yasser Arafat in Gaza and was compelled to address the issue of the new settlement housing.

"The decision which has been taken by Mr. Mordechai concerning building new houses is another breach of what has been agreed upon and what has been signed," Arafat said at a press conference.

Ross responded that "the American policy on settlement policy has not changed. We continue to see that it's a problem. We continue to see it's the kind of activity which complicates the negotiating process."

Ross did not use the customary word "obstacle," which Palestinians see as a stronger condemnation than "problem."

Settlement policy is a balancing act

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Israel's new settlement policy, unveiled recently by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, is essentially a balancing act on the part of a government which feels intense pressures from all sides.

Mideast Analysis

The policy spells finis to a four-year freeze on construction in existing settlements in the territories. It obviously pleases Jewish settlers and their supporters who chafed under the previous government's restrictions.

Netanyahu's policy, however, is based on the principle of gradualism and, more importantly, it does not sanction the building of new settlements. In this respect, it is something of a disappointment to hardliners in Israel's nationalist camp.

In essence, Netanyahu's policy seeks to placate various constituencies.

On the one hand, it appeases the majority in his right-wing coalition who want to continue the process of consolidating Israel's control over the territories, where Palestinian Arabs far outnumber Jews.

On the other hand, it sends an implicit signal to Washington, the Palestinians and the Arab states that Israel will not be bound by the wishes of Jewish extremists.

The policy is a source of general satisfaction to settlers because, in Netanyahu's own words, it theoretically gives Jews "the unqualified right ... to settle anywhere in the Land of Israel." More than anything else, this is a reference to the West Bank.

The former government, led by Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres, distinguished between "political" and "security" settlements. The first category was deemed expendable, while the second was considered to be in Israel's vested interests.

Netanyahu rejects such distinctions and thereby opens up the West Bank to wholesale Jewish settlement. "The previous government placed chains and bonds upon the natural development of settlements," said Netanyahu, referring to Rabin's decision to limit the scope of private construction in the territories.

For pragmatic reasons, Rabin and Peres finished building approximately 10,000 housing units begun by the Likud administration. In addition, they permitted another 4,000 units to be built in areas they intended to keep after a final agreement with the Palestinians: Jerusalem's hinterland, Gush Etzion and segments of northern Samaria closest to the Green Line.

A committee which monitored and supposedly controlled this activity was left to die, and thus Netanyahu ended Rabin's and Peres' settlement freeze.

But in a little-noticed decision, Netanyahu refused to re-establish a ministerial committee on settlement expansion the old Likud government had created. By implication, Ariel Sharon — the minister of national infrastructure and probably the settlers' loudest advocate in the cabinet — was denied a central role in the management of settlements.

Sharon's apparent marginalization, together with the government's move to concentrate decision-making powers on settlements in the hands of Netanyahu and Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, was doubtless meant to convey a message to the United States and the Arabs.

The message, as expressed by Netanyahu in his first interview with a Palestinian newspaper (al-Quds, published in East Jerusalem), is ambivalent at best.

The expansion of settlements, he declared, will unfold "without limits but under government supervision."

By all accounts, Netanyahu wishes to focus on building blocs of settlements around Israel's major cities and along the system of bypass roads started by the Labor government to improve the settlers' security.

Work already has begun on these projects. On Aug. 27, the cabinet approved the first phase of a new neighborhood in the West Bank settlement of Kiryat Sefer. And on Sept. 2, a new bypass road linking Jerusalem to settlements south of the capital was officially inaugurated.

The anticipated building boom is expected to attract some 50,000 settlers during Likud's four-year mandate, according to Pinchas Wallerstein, chair of the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza.

And while this is an impressive figure, settlers like Wallerstein would prefer to increase the Jewish population in the territories by 300,000 to 500,000 people.

In order to mollify the Palestinians, who consider the expansion of settlements as a violation of the Oslo accords, Netanyahu will probably proceed far more slowly, hewing to levels tolerated by Rabin and Peres.

During their watch, the Jewish population of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip grew from 96,000 to 145,000. In citing these figures during his first official trip to the United States in July, Netanyahu said, "I assume that no one here is expecting us to do less."

This, in a nutshell, is the direction Netanyahu's settlement policy will probably take.

France up in arms over Le Pen

By LEE YANOWITCH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS – France's political establishment has been up in arms over how to deal with the leader of the extreme-right National Front after he openly espoused racial inequality.

Jean-Marie Le Pen, who once dismissed the Nazi gas chambers as "a mere detail in the history of World War II," caused an uproar after he said in a radio interview recently: "To say that the races are unequal is a fact, an unremarkable statement."

He cited as an example the "obvious difference between white and black athletes" during the Olympic Games.

Le Pen, who has repeatedly denied that he is racist or anti-Semitic, won 15 percent of the vote in last year's French presidential election.

Henri Hajdenberg, president of CRIF, the umbrella organization of secular Jewish groups in France, said Le Pen's "ideology recalls that of the Nazis. We haven't heard this type of language in Europe since 1945. Not only is Jean-Marie Le Pen an anti-Semite who has been convicted several times by French courts, but he is also a racist."

Some political leaders responded to Le Pen's latest remarks by calling for his anti-immigrant party to be banned; others demanded that he be taken to court for inciting racial hatred.

"I will not be intimidated by the demonstrations or the threats of a thought police," Le Pen said in response to the outcry.

Justice Minister Jacques Toubon rejected calls to ban the Front as unconstitutional, but considered taking legal action against its 68-year-old leader.

But Toubon later changed his mind after the public prosecutor said Le Pen's remarks were too vague to be punished by existing legislation.

"If legal action was taken against Mr. Le Pen, it would be futile." Toubon told the daily newspaper Liberation.

Inciting racial hatred is a crime in France punishable by up to one year in prison, a $60,000 fine and a five-year ban on holding public office.

Toubon has vowed to stiffen France's hate laws to punish "indirect provocation, indirect calls for racist acts, hatred, violence or discrimination based on race" and said he would try to present a draft bill to Parliament when its autumn session opens in October.

He also wants to toughen sanctions for racist crimes and speed up trials for their perpetrators.

France, along with Germany and Belgium, now has some of the most stringent laws against espousing racial hatred in the 15-nation European Union, which has attempted, but so far failed, to develop a unified legislative stance.

86-year-old widow attacked

PARIS – The widow of a Jewish man whose body was disinterred in 1990 by five skinheads was attacked and beaten by an unidentified man.

The incident occurred after the woman had publicly rejected an apology from one of the vandals responsible for the cemetery desecration.

Magdeleine Germon, 86, was hospitalized with head injuries after a young man, posing as a mail carrier, entered her apartment.

After threatening to kill her, he beat and attempted to suffocate her before fleeing when neighbors were alerted by her screams.

The day before, Germon had appeared on television to say she would not forgive Bertrand Nouveau, one of four former neo-Nazis who confessed to removing the body of her husband, Felix, from his grave in the Jewish cemetery in the southern town of Carpentras in 1990.

From his prison cell, where he has been held since his arrest in August, Nouveau expressed his apologies to Germon and to "the entire Jewish population," saying that he had been influenced by the "hateful and xenophobic stance" of the extreme-right National Front.

It was unclear whether the attack on Germon was motivated by the cemetery desecration or by her televised comments.

"I have received threats, and so has she, by telephone or in the mail," said Germon's lawyer, Jean-Marc Fedida, who added that the threats had increased since the skinheads' arrests, which ended a six-year investigation.

The arrests came after four of the five neo-Nazi skinheads confessed in August to the May 1990 desecration of the Carpentras cemetery. The fifth member of the group was said to have died in a motorcycle accident.

The four said they had desecrated 34 graves and disinterred Felix Germon's body to pay tribute to Adolf Hitler and to mark the anniversary of Germany's surrender, May 8, 1945.

The desecration caused an uproar in France and sent 100,000 people, including then-president Francois Mitterrand, to voice their outrage in a mass demonstration.

Down's syndrome artist designs Israeli stamps

By DANIEL KEREN
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — The Israel Postal Authority recently released a series of three commemorative postage stamps that celebrate the inauguration of the New Year 5757.

The stamps were designed by a talented artist — Sahar Pick — who was born in 1973 with Down's syndrome.

This is the first time that Israel has taken advantage of the artistic skills of an individual born with Down's syndrome.

Also known as Trisomy 21, the syndrome occurs in one out of 500 or 600 people. It is characterized by moderate to severe developmental delay; heart or kidney malformations or both; and abnormal dermal ridge patterns on fingers, palms and soles.

In recent years, special educators have developed techniques to help children born with Down's syndrome realize their full potential. Pick's parents who live in Carmiel, a development town in the Galilee, decided that their son should live as normal a life as possible.

They insisted on his attending a regular kindergarten and he was later enrolled in the Moriah State Religious School in Carmiel, where he completed Grade 6.

Afterwards, Pick studied at the Rogavic School at the Amal Junior High School for Special Education in Kiryat Haim and at the youth immigration boarding school on Moshav Nehalim. At the age of 17, he was accepted into a nursing course at the WIZO Hadassah Institute in Jerusalem, where he made a name for himself as a highly motivated, serious and responsible student.

Together with other members of the course, Pick volunteered to take part in activities of the IDF, where he received the title of Distinguished Divisional Soldier.

While in Jerusalem, Pick studied art privately with artist Ruth Beckman-Malka. Beckman-Malka has designed numerous commemorative stamp issues for the Israel Postal Authority, the most recent being the 1996 Memorial Day stamp released in April to honor those members of the Israeli Police Force who have given up their lives in the line of duty to protect their fellow countrymen.

At the age of 21, Pick enlisted for full military service as a "volunteer." During this time, he continued to study art, taking lessons from artist Deni Hazbani. Pick won scholarships as a result of his art.

Sahar Pick

Upon recently completing his 2½ years of voluntary service in the Israeli army, Pick gained employment with the Carmiel Community Centre and is now responsible for designing the costumes of the various dance groups that perform in the centre.

The set of three Israeli stamps will include symbolic art Pick designed to communicate popular motifs of the Jewish festivals of Rosh Hashanah, Sukkot and Simchat Torah.

Featured on the 1.05-shekel stamp is a bowl of honey and two lighted candles. During the festive meal, both challah and an apple are dipped in the honey and a prayer is recited to symbolize the hope that the coming new year should be a sweet one for all the Jewish people around the world.

Highlighted on the 1.60-shekel stamp are a variety of decorations that are traditionally employed in decorating a sukkah, the temporary dwelling place that recalls the booths that the children of Israel lived in following their exodus from Egypt. The decorating of the sukkah is often done by the children and contributes to the holiday atmosphere of Sukkot.

Completing the stamps designed by Pick is the 1.90-shekel stamp, which offers a colorful illustration of the inside of a synagogue at Simchat Torah, when the last portion from sefer Devarim (Deuteronomy) are read and the first verses from sefer Bereishit (Genesis) are recited, thus completing the annual cycle of Torah readings in the synagogue that began on the previous Simchat Torah. Pick chose to illustrate the Torah scroll being raised for all in the synagogue to see, illuminated by the colorful lights shining overhead.

Argentina compensates Jew tortured by military

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES – An elderly Argentine Jew who lives in the United States has expressed delight at having lived long enough to see justice done in his lengthy legal battle against the Argentine government.

In a landmark international human rights case, Jose Siderman won compensation from Argentina for torture and loss of property, after 20 years of harassment and legal struggle.

Siderman blamed endemic Argentine anti-Semitism for many of his problems.

"Since I was born in Argentina, because I'm Jewish, I have had many difficulties," Siderman said. "If you're Jewish in Argentina, you have 50 to 60 percent less chance of succeeding than any other Argentine."

With an unprecedented trial in an American court where a foreign government is being accused of crimes committed on its own soil, Argentina dispatched two emissaries who agreed to a sealed out-of-court settlement with Siderman, who is now 85 and living in Los Angeles.

Although the accord stipulated that the terms remain secret, the Los Angeles Times quoted published accounts from Buenos Aires that put Siderman's compensation at $6 million (US).

The New York Times cited a source who said the Argentine government "had agreed to pay a sizable monetary settlement to Mr. Siderman, his wife and their three children, and to acknowledge that they had been victimized by Argentina's former military regime."

Siderman and his attorneys from the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) of Southern California clearly considered the agreement a moral and financial victory.

Siderman's struggle started March 24, 1976, when a military junta began its "dirty war" against alleged subversives.

That night, soldiers knocked on the door of Siderman's home in the northwestern province of Tucuman, screaming, "Jew son of a whore, open the door."

Taken to a police command post, Siderman, then 65, was tortured with electric shocks and lit cigarettes, three of his ribs were broken and one of his testicles was crushed.

Siderman was released after seven days, and three months later fled with his family and settled in the United States, where one of his daughters lived.

The junta in Buenos Aires took over Siderman's property, estimated in court records at $26.4-million, and continued to harass the expatriate.

Claiming that Siderman had left Argentina illegally and falsified records, the government issued an international warrant for his arrest.

On the strength of the Interpol warrant, Siderman was arrested while on a visit to Italy and held for seven months.

The next year, Siderman, joined by the ACLU, filed suit against Argentina in U.S. District Court, marking the beginning of a 14-year legal journey.

Initially, the court awarded Siderman a $2.7-million default judgment against Argentina.

However, the Argentine government successfully appealed the verdict on the grounds that it could not be sued in a U.S. court for its treatment of Siderman, a position backed by the U.S. State Department.

Siderman found himself back at square one.

The case lay dormant for some years, during which Siderman returned to Argentina and unsuccessfully pleaded for compensationfrom the new civilian government, which had dismissed all the junta's charges against him.

However, in 1992, the case got a new life when a U.S. appeals court ruled that Argentina had unintentionally laid itself open to American jurisdiction. The reason was that in 1981, the junta, in its relentless pursuit of Siderman, had sought his arrest through papers filed with the Los Angeles County Superior Court.

In the next three years, Argentina unsuccessfully fought the appeals court's decision up to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Finally, this month, facing the possibility of becoming the first foreign government to be tried in the United States for human rights abuses committed within its own borders, Argentina responded to Siderman's earlier pleas for a negotiated settlement.

"The main message of this case to foreign governments is that if someone flees your country, you better not come after him in the United States," said ACLU attorney Paul Hoffman, who worked on Siderman's case.

"You better not hurt or harass him in this country, because then your government will be open to justice in the courts of the United States," Hoffman added. "That's an extremely important principle for every family seeking refuge in this country from torture or oppression."

Siderman said in an interview that anti-Semitism continues in Argentina despite the change to a democratic government.

"Anti-Semitism is the basic sentiment of all Argentines, except for a select few in public life," he said.

His son, Carlos Siderman, added that "without doubt, nothing has changed in Tucuman province," where the same general who conducted a particularly brutal "dirty war" against dissidents and Jews has now been elected governor.

Restraint urged on E. Jerusalem demolitions

By BILL HUTMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last week urged Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert to act with restraint when dealing with demolitions in east Jerusalem, because of the sensitivity to the subject shown by the Palestinians and the international community, government sources said.

The request was largely aimed at avoiding a showdown over the alleged illegal construction recently discovered next to Al-Aksa Mosque.

Netanyahu wants Olmert to hold off on taking action against the Wakf, the Muslim religious authority in charge of Al-Aksa, the sources said.

He also would like Olmert to delay demolishing an illegally constructed Palestinian home in the Old City, which had been slated for demolition, the sources said.

One source said that in both cases, "there is no question that the construction is illegal. But the timing [for taking action] is not right."

Another source said Olmert acted hastily on the Temple Mount construction, and should have tried to deal with the situation using "quieter channels."

The issue of demolitions was raised during a meeting between Netanyahu, Olmert, and other government and security officials.

They were presented with a report showing that some of the alleged illegal construction by the Wakf had halted. About 10 days ago, the Wakf was presented with a court order to halt all of the construction, on the grounds that it was being carried out without a permit.

Municipal sources said building inspectors would ascertain whether the order was being obeyed.

Now! Health insurance for your appliances. Why take chances?

For 13 years, Southern Atlantic Appliance Service has been providing a unique form of insurance to both home and condominium owners in Ontario. Robert and Errol Gordon founded the company in April of 1984, basing their idea on one which had been very successful in Florida for many years: a single insurance package for all makes and models of appliances. Until the father and son opened their business, no company in Toronto was offering such a package.

The Southern Atlantic Appliance Service Protection Plan works like other kinds of insurance. You avoid major repair bills and assure yourself of fast, dependable service by factory-trained technicians at no additional cost to you. For as little as $99 a year for 5 major appliances, or pennies a day, you can protect yourself against the high cost of repairs.

The Southern Atlantic Appliance Protection Plan covers all parts and labour required for maintaining the insured appliances in good operating condition. There is no limit to the number of repairs; and there are no charges for trips or pick-ups. You are guaranteed service within 24 hours of your call. Often, however, a technician will visit you on the same day.

Southern Atlantic technicians service any brand or model of appliance, so that no matter what makes you own, the one call to Southern is the only one you need to make. Southern Atlantic has also been authorized by Sub Zero, Thermador and other manufacturers to do warranty service. The company's technicians regularly attend schooling seminars in order to keep up with new technology in the appliance industry, and maintain their skills and efficiency at a high level. For non-members, Southern will make C.O.D. calls.

During the last few years, Southern Atlantic has expanded it's business to meet the needs of both their clients and the public by carrying a full line of top quality water filters for those concerned with maintaining the purity of their drinking water.

Southern Atlantic Appliance Service is a 100% Canadian-owned company, and member of the Better Business Bureau. In order to apply for your "Easy Peace of Mind" Protection Plan, don't hesitate to call: (905) 738-4076.

Labor blamed for economic woes

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The former Israeli Labor government's "departure from fiscal consolidation" and "expansionary fiscal policy" led to the present deterioration in the current-account deficit, a surge in consumer imports and accelerating inflation, according to the International Monetary Fund (IMF) statement issued last week.

"I'm sure we made mistakes," said former economics and planning minister Yossi Beilin. "We could have cut more, but it was difficult to do this before the elections."

Former finance minister Avraham Shohat defended his record, saying the Labor government did not stray from the path of fiscal consolidation.

"I don't want to enter a row with the IMF," said Shohat. However, he stressed that he disagreed with the IMF analysis. "The problems were not caused by spending, but a failure in the ability to collect revenue."

The IMF recommended that the government continue its budget cuts program, reduce spending and implement its structural reform program, which supports the Bank of Israel-Finance Ministry's efforts to put the economy back on track.

Prior to the publication of the report there was intense speculation in the Hebrew media that the IMF would severely criticize the state of the economy. Indeed, the report does express considerable concern about a variety of negative trends, but it sums up by saying the policies currently being put in place could well solve the difficulties.

The absorption of new immigrants is proving to be successful, writes the five-member IMF group, which was headed by the deputy director of its European section Michael Deppler. Israel now has full employment, even over-employment, given the number of foreign workers here.

However, the potential of this new immigrant workforce remains to be fully tapped.

On a positive note, the IMF said, "The new government is fully committed to relieving these strains through its policies of fiscal consolidation, disinflation and structural reform."

If these are closely followed, there is a "good" chance this will lead to "a more sustainable growth path with rising living standards, declining inflation, near- current levels of unemployment, a more competitive real exchange rate and a viable balance of payments."

However, the IMF feels there is little room for manoeuvre, and the policies must be brought to bear in a "coordinated and integrated fashion."

Russian Jews discuss a range of issues in Dinner With Friends.

Russian Jews sit and chat at a TV dinner

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Dinner With Friends is an interesting television concept. Host/dinner guest Barry Cooke, a psychologist and teacher, sits down at a table with a group of people from an ethnic community and engages them in a lively conversation.

On Oct. 9 at 8:30 p.m. on Vision TV, Cooke meets Russians, or, to be more precise, Russian Jews, and elicits a spectrum of observations from them.

In this episode, the conversation flows freely as his guests discuss life under communism, the status of Jews in the old Soviet Union, their level of religious observance and Canadian democracy.

They are a mixed lot, differing in age, experience, loquaciousness and conviviality.

Not surprisingly, they express contempt for the Communist system. But an elderly woman admits that she enjoyed a full cultural and social life in the former Soviet Union.

"To be a Jew in Russia was a very hard task," says a middle-aged man, delving into an oft-discussed topic.

Two-hour stroll of London's Old Jewish Quarter

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

LONDON, ENGLAND — At the doorway of Britain's oldest synagogue, tucked away in a gated courtyard in the area of London's financial district, stands Henry, the young-looking bearded shammes, black silk top hat in hand. Today the hat is being used to collect donations; on Shabbat, it is still worn by worshippers honored with an aliyah to read from the Torah.

A half-hour stop at the Bevis Marks Synagogue, which has about 200 members and holds services four days a week, is without question the highlight of the two-hour walking tour of London's Old Jewish Quarter (''a shtetl called Whitechapel'') offered by a company called The Original London Walks.

Built in 1701 and modelled after Amsterdam's then 25-year-old Portuguese Synagogue, the Bevis Marks Synagogue is rich with symbolism and dark wood. For special occasions, the candles in the original seven gold chandeliers — representing Shabbat and the six days of creation — are lit by hand, a task that takes 45 minutes to complete. (There are also electric lights, which together with the floor constitute the only non-original parts of the synagogue.)

The seats, some of which predate the building, include a roped-off one reserved at one time for Sir Moses Montefiore and now specified for his direct descendants, although exceptions have been made for royalty (Prince Philip in 1951) and for the Lord Mayor of London.

Petticoat Lane

As historic as the synagogue is, it's a relative newcomer in British history. The first stop on the walking tour is at the ruin of London's city wall dating back to Roman times.

Tour guide Steve (a musician and actor with a flair for the dramatic) provides a zippy crash course in British Jewish history from the time of William the Conqueror (1066) into the 20th century.

Before the Jews were expelled from Britain in 1290, it was ''difficult, nay, impossible'' for them to work in the city's church-run guilds or livery companies, said Steve. With royal sanction to become merchants and moneylenders, they prospered, but suffered persecution.

Following the expulsion, before the Jews were formally invited back in 1650 by Oliver Cromwell, there was still a Jewish presence in the country, said Steve, albeit in the form of Conversos such as Dr. Roderigo Lopez, who is generally believed to be the prototype for Shylock in Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice.

The East End walking tour encompasses the area that was home to Jewish immigrants from Russia and Poland from the 1880s into the early decades of this century — ''the worst and most notorious slum in London.''

Today London's Jewish community, which numbers close to 200,000, is mostly concentrated in the northwest part of the city. Golders Green, where Jews first settled during World War I, has many amenities such as kosher butchers, bakeries and bed and breakfast establishments.

Sites seen on the tour of Old Jewish London include Petticoat Lane, known for its outdoor market, a Jewish soup kitchen established in 1902 and — a sign of the times — a former synagogue that is now a mosque, a reflection of a newer generation of immigrants to inhabit the East End.

The Original London Walks can be reached at P.O. Box 1708, London NW6 4LW or, by phone, 0171-624-3978. Complete information is available on the Internet at [http://www.bogo.co.uk/London.Walks]. Adult prices are approximately $9.

Other specialty walks include two Beatles walks (''In My Life'' and Magical Mystery Tour), Ghosts of the Old City, Legal London and Sherlock Holmes & the Baker St. Beat.

Dinner with Russians

Some Jews, he notes, tried to conceal their origins so as not to be burdened by anti-Semitism. Citing an example, he mentions Vladimir Zhirinovsky, the fascistic and clownish Russian politician whose father was a Jew.

Speaking of the virtual impossibility of emigrating from the Soviet Union before the early 1970s, another guest comments that the 1967 Six Day War encouraged Jews to apply for exit visas.

They tell us that they kept their distance from synagogues because they feared losing their jobs. A younger man explains that, while he is not observant, he feels Jewish and has a kinship with Jewish history.

The challenge on adapting to a new society in Canada has not been easy for them. Apart from having had to master English, these Russian Jews had to learn Canadian ''patterns of behavior'' and, one 30ish woman says, how to smile.

Having been raised in a totalitarian society where public rudeness was the norm, they are impressed with Canadian democracy and with the politeness of people on the street.

One can understand and empathize with Cooke's guests. They give voice to the views and feelings of thousands of Russian Jewish immigrants in Canada.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

Streets Of St. Petersburg

On our first day in St. Petersburg, Russia, we took a tour that showed off the magnificence of this city of exquisite palaces, cathedrals, prospekts and Venetian-style canals.

We saw the Peter and Paul Fortress, Nevsky Prospekt, Palace Square, the Admiralty, several cathedrals with swirling onion domes, miscellaneous grand palaces and the Hermitage, one of the world's great art museums.

We also peeked into a few hotels and department stores, each with security guards posted prominently. Even our tour bus featured an unarmed guard.

"Of course we have some crime, but not as much as Los Angeles, Detroit or Miami," said Anna Kornilieva, our tour guide. "I saw an American television documentary about St. Petersburg and the new Russian mafia, and I didn't recognize my own city. It was a Hollywood fantasy."

Perhaps unfairly, this exquisite Baltic jewel has attained a reputation as a crime-infested city where murders, kidnappings, robberies, shoot-outs and sidewalk scams are common. The city comes across as a sort of lawless megapolis of the Eurasian Wild East, paralleling the American Wild West of the last century.

History might have something to do with it, since it was the anger of these people, or at least that of their grandparents, that sparked the Russian Revolution. The bus pulled into Revolution Square, scene of massive bloody confrontations in 1905 and 1917. As I hopped out to photograph the statues in the square, a Lada rushing recklessly by nearly hit me.

By contrast, the grand halls of the Hermitage seemed peaceful. Formerly belonging to the Czars, this series of palaces is now one of the world's foremost art museums, housing millions of works. The Hidden Treasures, a collection of dozens of impressionist canvases by Van Gogh, Degas, Matisse, Cezanne, Picasso and other celebrated modern artists, were being exhibited.

Emboldened after 50 years of secrecy, the Russians are proudly displaying these priceless paintings which they confiscated from Germany at the end of World War II. Few here agree that Russia should return them to the Germans, just as few can forget Germany's 900-day wartime siege of this city, then called Leningrad.

On my second day in St. Petersburg, I decided to forego another prepackaged tour, and ventured out independently. Since the public buses are crowded and unpredictable, I tried hitchhiking, a common and acceptable form of commuting, especially by tourists.

There are not enough taxis in this city of five million, so visitors rely on the kindness of strangers – plus a few American dollars or their equivalent in rubles – to get around. All one has to do is stand at the curb and gesture towards an approaching vehicle as if hailing a cab. Chances are pretty good that it will stop.

The rules are fairly straightforward. Keep out of cars with several passengers for safety reasons. Avoid foreign cars, which are impossible to repair. Don't get into a shiny, late-model European car because the driver may be a gangster. If it's an old Lada carrying only the driver – hop in.

A suitable car stopped almost as soon as I began gesturing at curbside. Twenty minutes later, the driver let me off by the Aeroflot building on Nevsky Prospekt.

I recently spent a few hours retracing my steps through St. Petersburg, courtesy of Lonely Planet's city guide for St. Petersburg ($16.95). This slim guidebook, which slides easily into a pocket or purse, offers excellent descriptions of all relevant sites and plenty of maps, color photographs and museum floor plans.

Israeli Tourism Ministry hopes more Canadians will visit

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — The chilled relations between Israeli and PLO peace negotiators since the recent election and last winter's string of Hamas bombings are among the factors that have led to a decrease of tourism in 1996, acknowledges Arie Sommer, Israel's new tourism commissioner for North America.

Based in New York, Sommer recently met about 30 local travel industry officials during a lunch hosted by the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) in Toronto. Afterwards, he told them that the Israeli Ministry of Tourism has high hopes for increasing the number of Canadians travelling to Israel.

"We have a lot of plans for Canada for the next year," he said. "Over the next five or six years, we hope to double the traffic from Canada."

While IGTO director Ruth Ben-Tzur puts the number of Canadians who visited Israel last year at about 52,000, Samuel Kalev, El Al's representative for Ontario and Western Canada, provides a more conservative estimate of about 48,000. Whatever the actual numbers, Israeli tourism officials are keen to see them rise, and clearly see the potential for Israel to draw more than 100,000 Canadians annually by 2002.

Pilgrimage

Sommer said that while his office intended to increase efforts to woo the Christian pilgrimage market, it wouldn't neglect the Jewish market.

"For years we didn't pay much attention to the Jewish market, on the assumption that the Jews would come to Israel because they are Jewish. But we've found that many Jews from North America have never visited Israel."

Explaining that Israel is perceived as an "emotional and historical destination" and that the most effective method of persuasion involves "word of mouth," Stanley Morais, an IGTO official, played a videotape of a 30-second television commercial that has already started airing on CBC NewsWorld and other stations across Canada. In the commercial, a man tells his friend about his incredible trip to Israel, saying, "I couldn't believe it. It was like I could see with my eyes what I've always felt with my heart."

That's precisely the sort of message that "is going to get the adrenalin flowing in the public," according to Sara Pachter, senior Israel travel consultant for Fisher-Fremont Travel, 535 Eglinton Ave. W. "I think that the constant repetition of that message is going to be enormously helpful to us in selling Israel to the Canadian public."

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

People Of The Book

As we turn the page into the New Year of 5757, Eye On Arts presents its second annual survey of what some people in our community involved in the world of arts and letters are currently reading:

• Sheldon Godfrey, who last year co-authored (with Judith Godfrey) Search Out The Land: The Jews and the Growth of Equality in British Colonial America, 1740-1867 (McGill-Queen's U.), puts suspense novelists John Grisham and Ken Follett high on his list of favorite authors.

"I'm reading some old books at the moment – I have Duddy Kravitz beside my bed and James Michener's Alaska, which I'm just about finished. It's one of his epics, starting with prehistory and coming right up to the present moment. It's brilliant."

• Erna Paris, whose recent book The End Of Days: A Story of Tolerance, Tyranny and the Expulsion of the Jews from Spain is soon to be released by Key-Porter Books in paperback, is reading The Politics of Memory: The Journey of A Holocaust Historian, by Raul Hilberg.

"I'm finding it very sad, actually, that a man of such distinction and accomplishment seems to have had so little satisfaction from his exceptional career. Hilberg wrote the definitive book on the Holocaust, called The Destruction of the European Jews. He seems to be very bitter about the battles he has had to fight and the controversies that have surrounded his work. I'm saddened by his apparent lack of resolution of these personal and professional issues."

• Dr. Shel Krakofsky, whose book of poetry Blind Messiah won a Jewish Book Prize this year, is currently reading Cynthia Ozick's Fame & Folly (Knopf), a book of essays. "She is, as usual, brilliant, sensitive and combative," he says.

As well, he is reading Fugitive Pieces, by Ann Michaels (McClelland and Stewart), about a Greek archeologist who rescues a boy from the Holocaust and eventually brings him to Toronto.

"A hilarious romp"

"It's a beautifully written book but it lacks verisimilitude. Nevertheless, it's a significant work of art and I think it will win the Governor General's Award."

Krakofsky is also reading Therapy, by David Lodge (Viking), which he describes as "a hilarious satirical romp about British psychiatry and the world of writing."

• Helen Redner, who has been the director of Toronto's annual Jewish Book Fair since 1980, has just begun reading Jane and the Unpleasantness at Scargrave Manor: Being the First Jane Austen Mystery, by Stephanie Barron, a mystery novel featuring the famed British novelist as a character.

"I'm reading it because Jane Austen is a favorite author of mine, not just because of her new-found popularity. It seems like a fun idea to feature her as a sleuth. It's quite a change for me, since I spend so much time reading publishers' catalogues and book reviews for the book fairs."

• Toronto-based screenwriter Len Blum has recently been occupied with The Agony of Czechoslovakia, 38/68, by Kurt Weisskopf (Elek/Ryerson). He notes that in 1938, the invading Germans replaced Czech-language street signs in Prague with bilingual signs with German predominant.

"I find it telling that the Germans understood that it was important to the psychological oppression of the Czech people to assert their own language visibly. Naturally I'm compelled to read this book for its own sake, but I'm surprised to find similarities to certain conditions in Canada – namely the language battles currently being waged in Montreal."

• Ruby Newman, a lecturer of humanities and women's studies at York University, is currently reading The Shadow Man, a memoir by novelist Mary Gordon.

According to Newman, the author describes her attempts to understand her late father, who converted from Judaism to Catholicism and lied about the main events of his life. The book, she says, is "a daughter's search for her father and also a search for her own Jewishness."

• And me? At the moment, I'm halfway through Possession, by A.S. Byatt, who also wrote the novel upon which the wonderful movie Angels and Insects was based.

Set in contemporary England, Possession describes discoveries made and secrets held by a coterie of literary scholars specializing in the life and work of a revered Victorian poet. It's both a satire of our prurient need for overblown literary biographies and a genuine romantic adventure, full of breathtaking prose and surprises. Although weighted down with whimsical Victorian poetry, it's still a great read.

Theme hotel to open by late 1998

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Israel's first theme hotel, the Eilat Queen of Sheba Hilton, is due to open at the end of 1998, according to real estate developer Yitzhak Tshuva, who is building the 450-room hotel.

Tshuva signed a contract with Hilton International, which is to manage the property. In addition to being built on a Queen of Sheba theme, similar in style to Sun City in South Africa, the hotel is to have half its rooms built as apartment units, which are to be sold to private buyers.

"The hotel is on the only privately owned beachfront property in Eilat," Tshuva said. "Each buyer will be registered in Tabu."

The hotel, Tshuva said, would be more luxurious than anything existing until now in Israel. It will have a large public commercial recreation and restaurant complex on the ground floor, he said.

Montreal teen dreams of World Cup of soccer

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — If Canada is lucky enough to make it into the next World Cup of soccer — slated for 1998 in France — don't be surprised if a Jewish Montrealer is playing defence.

Adam Braz seems to be well on his way.

At only 15, Braz, a resident of St. Laurent, is one of only three Quebecers — and the only Canadian Jew — to be selected to the national junior "elite" team in the age 17 and under category.

Braz, a student at Herzliyah-St. Laurent, is laid back about his feat.

But there's no doubt that Braz, who is already a strapping 6 feet tall, is in love with the game that has dominated the international sports scene just about everywhere except North America.

"It's not a slow game like some people think," said Braz in an interview, accompanied by his dad, Roni, himself a former soccer player in Israel.

"It's exciting and it's intense."

Braz hopes to be a professional soccer player one day, even while recognizing the odds are stacked against him — or even Canada — getting to the World Cup.

As it is, even making it to his age-group equivalent — the World Youth Cup in 1997 in Egypt — will be tough enough.

First, his Canadian team will have to do well at a junior tournament in Bermuda next month, and then in August in Trinidad and Tobago at a qualifying match for the World Youth Cup.

Since only three of 16 teams competing in Trinidad and Tobago will qualify, it will take some doing for Canada to make the grade.

Roni Braz saw the potential in Adam, then a student at Royal Vale, at the young age of seven, when Roni was coaching a house league team and saw right away that his son had "very fast, very good control of the ball."

Adam Braz took to the game right away and moved up the ranks year by year, graduating to provincial "selection" teams and competing in the Jeux de Quebec and Canadian age-group championships.

At the most recent try for the Canadian title, Braz scored two of the Quebec squad's total of four goals even though he was playing defence.

Last year, Braz was a member of the age-group Canadian national team competing at the l'Image Internationale tournament in France.

Braz's approach to the game is to try to "visualize" the action befor taking the field.

His lankiness and height is above average for a soccer player, and growing any taller will be a disadvantage because "his eyes will be further away from the ball," his father said.

To stay in shape, Braz practices five times a week, up to two hours a day, year-round, including some weight-training.

But his father stresses that it is Adam, not himself, who has his sights set on a professional career.

"I have always told him that school comes before soccer," Roni Braz emphasized. "He has to keep his marks up to a certain level.

As it happens, Braz's family is full of athletes. Older brother Avi, 17, plays basketball, and younger sister Ashley, 12, is making something of a name for herself in figure skating.

Asked why only one Jewish player has made it to so high a competitive level despite the numerous number of Jewish players at parochial schools, and Roni Braz has a ready answer.

It's not a question of there not being Jewish talent or potential out there, he said.

"It's just that you won't get the same level of coaching or competition you find elsewhere."

Adam Braz, for example, says he would not be where he is today had he not had the privilege to play on Quebec "elite league" teams or been coached by two of the province's best, Valerio Gazzolla of the Montreal Impact, and his assistant, Francis Millen.

Maccabi leader calls for exploring new structures

MONTREAL — Would the Jewish continuity cause be better served if Maccabi Canada (MC) — with its raison d'etre of reaching out to Jewish kids — came under some sort of formal affiliation with federation structures?

In the mind of Ronald Bakalarz, president of the Maccabi World Union (MWU), the answer is yes.

The Bogota, Colombia-based Bakalarz, who visited Montreal and Toronto recently to meet with MC officials, told The CJN that he would like to see MC become an "agency" of local federations, a situation he said already exists in the United States.

Local Maccabi leadership, however, is not so sure.

Gordie Schwartz, MC's national fundraising chair, said while Maccabi leaders who met with Bakalarz were enthusiastic over his idea to put particular focus on continuity by increasing the number of MC events at a local level, there is not necessarily any need to create "formal" ties with federations.

"Of course, there is a role [for the federation] to play, and it merits some type of study," allowed Schwartz, himself long associated both with Maccabi Canada and FEDERATION CJA campaign activities.

But that role would probably be more in line with both organizations' working "in harmony" towards common continuity goals, he said.

Schwartz said the Montreal community is so close-knit and its activities so intertwined, interaction on common agendas is inevitable, as well as desirable.

"Bakalarz had in mind [MC] becoming the 'sports arm of the federation,' " Schwartz said. "But we have the Y, and the natural tie is there."

Moreover, Schwartz added, U.S. assimilation rates are much higher than in Canada, where "we have a pretty good handle on Jewish continuity."

Still, Bakalarz's main priority — that MC should be more continuity-conscious and aggressive in reaching out to "unaffiliated" Jewish youth by organizing more grassroots sports, educational and cultural activities as a framework for Jewish identification — was not lost on local MC leaders.

One of the ideas already in the works, according to national athletic committee chair Bob Luxenberg, is to stage an annual "mini-Maccabiah" for Jewish schools. The project is being led by MC veteran Harry Hus.

MC also showed an interest in one of Bakalarz's favorite projects, the Israel Experience, a travel program run under the auspices of the MWU in which Jewish athletes from the Diaspora tour Israel and experience it fully in the Jewish continuity context, not just through sports.

One idea put forward by David Lisbona, a Montrealer involved with supporting Israel's hockey program, was to organize a trip for local Jewish hockey players.

According to Luxenberg, MC has always worked according to the principle that Jewish sports involvement is a means to an end — a "tool" — and not an end in itself.

Unlike the elaborate communal structures in North America, Bakalarz said that in many of the Maccabi movement's 57 nations, the MWU is the primary sports, educational and cultural body, connecting Jews to their identity through activities that even include music, dance, and folklore festivals.

One suggestion to Bakalarz — put forward by MC leader Mary Luxenberg — was to aim for more female representation at the Maccabiah, such as by fielding women's basketball and volleyball teams.

Contemplating a miracle

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "The birth of a child is a miracle of renewal. We stand together this day, contemplating a miracle."

Surrounded by family and friends, rabbinical student Robert Morais and his wife Rochelle repeated these words at the brit habat of their firstborn, Sarah Arielle, in an affirmation of Jewish life and survival triumphing over the obscenities of Hitler and Mussolini.

The joyous service was prepared and led by Amy Greenbaum and Jonathan Tabachnikoff, students with Morais at Cincinnati's Hebrew Union College. Musical accompaniment was provided by Aaron Tornberg. The service was held in the home of Rochelle's sister and brother-in-law, Denise and Howard Shilling, under a chupah that Rochelle had originally helped to design and embroider for her wedding.

During the ceremony, Sarah Arielle snuggled in the arms of her great-grandmother, Eva (Handke) Salinas, while her great-grandfather, Armando Salinas, looked on.

In 1940, Berlin-born Eva Handke, still in her teens, was ordered, as a Jew, to report for forced labor at a factory operated by Siemens, the German munitions giant.

Eva's parents realized that it was time to take their only daughter and get out of the country. But where could they go?

A relative in Shanghai sent visas, but they also needed transit visas for each of the seven countries en route.

"We would collect four and three would expire before we got the others," Eva remembers. Over and over her father made the frustrating rounds of the consulates, until at last they had a fistful of stamped and restamped visas.

A circuitous train journey through numerous jurisdictions finally brought them through Siberia to Shanghai and temporary safety.

Armando Salinas was born in Alexandria, Egypt, of Italian Jewish lineage. Though both his parents had also been born in Egypt, they retained their Italian citizenship.

When Armando was 9, the family decided to settle in Rome. In 1938, as anti-Semitic rumblings escalated, he returned to his Egyptian birthplace but his visa was not renewed. From there he went to England where he had relatives, the Sassoons, who had international holdings. He had a doctorate in commerce and finance and studied briefly at London University. While he was on holiday in Switzerland, World War II broke out.

In 1940, the Sassoons sent him to Bombay to work in one of their banks, but because of his Italian citizenship and the likelihood of his being interned, they transferred him to a bank in Shanghai.

Eva was a clerk at the hotel where Armando was staying and he made frequent stops at her desk. They became engaged on Dec. 8, 1941, the day after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor and were married at the Italian consulate in Shanghai the following February.

Their first daughter, Liliana, who would later become Robert Morais' mother, was only 4 months old when they were taken by the Japanese and transported into the interior for internment in a camp at a former American mission in Weih-Sen.

Because the Salinas were Italian citizens, they were considered "quasi-enemies" and were not harmed, though any internment under the Japanese was harsh and threatening.

"When things went badly for them in battle, we worried," Eva recalls.

They also worried constantly about their baby as proper nourishment became scarce.

In 1945, after two years in the camp, they were freed by American soldiers and returned to Shanghai. They set out on another round-about voyage, this time by slow boat, ultimately arriving in England.

Armando applied for visitors' visas to Canada and once here, they were granted permanent residence as political refugees and in due course earned Canadian citizenship.

In 1953, a second daughter, Jacqueline, became the first Canadian-born member of the family.

Now, after 54 years of marriage, Eva and Armando are able, with their family and Rochelle's family who emigrated from South Africa, to "contemplate a miracle."

The Inside Back

About Life

Dear Ella,

I have a relative whom I see every once in a while. I just saw her at our family gathering on Rosh Hashanah. She is a very nice person and I usually enjoy her company, however there is one thing she does that bothers me tremendously. She talks about anyone and everyone behind their backs. She talks about her best friend, her sister and brother, her parents, her in-laws, and I know that she is also talking about me.

I know that she has a good heart, and I am not sure why she does this or that she is even aware that she is always talking about people behind their backs. Of course the comments are always nasty and usually uncalled for.

I am afraid to say anything to her, because I know when I leave she will be talking about me!

I don't want to stop my relationship with this person, because other than this unfortunate need to judge people so harshly, she really is a very nice person.

Any suggestions as to how to handle this situation?

Dodging the Dagger

Dear Dodging the Dagger,

It is unfortunate that your relative feels she has to talk about people behind their backs. I can understand how this could create a feeling of mistrust.

If you feel you can't say anything around her, then what is the point of staying in touch? I have to wonder if your relative realizes what she is doing and how much it affects not only the people she is talking about, but the people she is talking to.

It's time for someone to tell her what she is doing, not in an accusatory fashion, but in a caring and concerned way.

This is not an easy task, but someone has got to do it. It should be someone close, and it should not come off sounding like an attack.

If she only knew that she was hurting those closest to her, I'm sure she would think twice before talking behind peoples' backs.

Diplomatically Speaking

BY JEHUDI KINAR

I recently returned from home leave in Israel. The 3½ weeks passed in a flash as usual. Although it had only been half a year since my last visit to Israel, I was again struck by the changes which had taken place. It seems that the construction of roads and houses is ever increasing.

The scene on the streets of Jerusalem drew my attention as I shared my walks there with many tourists, who were probably less struck by a new image. I saw faces around me which were not part of the image of Jerusalem I had in my mind. Strangers, but not tourists, were present in large numbers.

Suddenly I realized that these were the foreign workers who arrived in Israel to reinforce our labor force. As I have served and lived in the past in a few European countries, I am familiar with the situation of foreign laborers who were not always well received by the citizens of the host country. Nobody knows exactly how many foreigners have succeeded in entering Israel legally or illegally. Estimates vary from 200,000 to 400,000. I hope that we shall not have to face similar unfortunate experiences guest workers endured in Europe.

By contrast, I was delighted to learn about some of the new and dynamic changes taking place at home. I had no idea of the extent of activities available for those seeking fun and perhaps an activity off the beaten track. While people travel the globe, spending huge sums of money in search of a thrill, many of these activities are available in Israel. For those adventurous souls, Israel now offers hang gliding, parasailing and jeep rides to the north and south that provide newcomers with a sense of the desert.

In the meantime, the High Holy Day period is upon us, but hotel rooms are still available in Israel. We realize that prices remain on the higher side; this is a problem the Israel tourist industry must contend with. Recently, many international triple star hotel chains decided to build a number of hotels throughout Israel. This added competition will undoubtedly bring prices down. People accustomed to the services of these chains will find that they receive the identical service in Israel.

As the festival of Sukkot approaches, pilgrims from around the world will make their way to the Holy Land. It seems only natural that the vast majority of these visitors would be Jews making the ascent to Israel as in biblical times, to mark one of our pilgrim festivals (Shalosh Haregalim).

In my daily encounters with Canadian Jews, it is striking to realize how many have never visited Israel. As we approach the 100-year anniversary of the official founding of Zionism as a movement and prepare to mark 50 years since the establishment of the State of Israel, the time has come for Jews to celebrate these momentous and proud occasions in Eretz Yisrael.

Summit called to defuse crisis

By HILLEL KUTTLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat were to meet in Washington Tuesday, at President Bill Clinton's invitation, in a bid to defuse Israeli-Palestinian tensions and resume negotiations.

They are to be joined by Jordan's King Hussein and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak was invited.

A senior U.S. official said the meetings were to run Tuesday and Wednesday. The first day would consist of separate bilateral meetings between the leaders and Clinton and Secretary of State Warren Christopher, with expanded plenary meetings scheduled for Wednesday.

The official said that the United States will urge Netanyahu to put redeployment from Hebron "on the fast track" to move negotiations ahead.

"The sights are on Hebron as the key first step. These discussions will be focused on an implementing mechanism," he said.

Tunnel Turmoil

Christopher cautioned that because neither Netanyahu nor Arafat could afford to be away from home for a long visit, "we should not expect miracles out of this rather brief meeting here.

"They're estranged. They're pretty raw and so I think the important thing is to get them back into direct contact, discussing these issues," he said on NBC's Meet the Press.

Arafat and Netanyahu initially refused to make any concessions to bring about the summit, but Channel 2 said last Sunday night a tradeoff was shaping up.

Arafat would pledge to end the violence and stop objecting to the tunnel, while Netanyahu would agree to a timetable for future negotiations and a date for Israel's pullout from Hebron, the report said.

'I will do whatever I can to win leadership,' Barak says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff reporter

TORONTO — "I'm used to winning," said Ehud Barak, the leading contender for Shimon Peres' job as head of the Labor party. "And I will do whatever I can to win."

Exclusive

Barak – Israel's former chief of staff and its foreign minister during Peres' short-lived reign as prime minister following Yitzhak Rabin's murder – discussed party politics and the peace process in an interview in Toronto last week. His trip to Canada was sponsored by the United Jewish Appeal.

Fresh from an overnight flight from Tel Aviv, a jet-lagged Barak exuded brash self-confidence and a measure of introspection in addressing these topics.

A boyish 54, Barak said the Labor party could have won the general election last May if egregious technical and tactical mistakes had not been made.

Barak, who was in charge of Peres' campaign for prime minister, said the party's major errors were three-fold. It was too closely associated with the left-of-centre Meretz party. It was perceived as anti-religious and elitist. And it was seen as moving too fast with respect to the peace process.

If he is elected party leader, Barak intends to take a cautious, perhaps conservative, approach to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

He is opposed to a Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, notwithstanding a recent decision by the Labor party to drop this objection from its platform. Barak favors a confederation or a federation between a Palestinian entity and Jordan. "But we can't

Hebron high on summit agenda

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Last Sunday, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat accepted President Bill Clinton's invitation to the five-party Washington summit, according to Arafat's media adviser, Nabil Abu Rudeineh, and he left Monday for prior consultations with Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak in Cairo.

TUNNEL TURMOIL

Arafat's spokesperson Marwan Kanafani said Arafat will raise all the outstanding issues from Oslo 1 and Oslo 2, including Hebron redeployment and safe passages, in addition to demanding timetables for the unspecified IDF redeployment from parts of Area C and a date for starting final-status talks.

Clinton, in his phone call to Gaza, "insisted that he will work with President Arafat to ensure the participation of President Mubarak as an indication of the pivotal role that the president of Egypt plays. Egypt is the major player in the peace process in the Middle East," Kanafani said.

Hebron is likely to be the most difficult problem on the agenda, as the Israeli government believes last week's riots showed even more clearly than before the dangers of deploying Palestinian police close to settlements. In Gaza, settlements came under fire and in Ramallah, gunmen fired from the high ground around IDF posts.

Peace Now hold march

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – A crowd that Peace Now organizers estimated at about 7,000 marched in Jerusalem from Yitzhak Rabin's grave on Mount Herzl to a square near Benjamin Netanyahu's home last Sunday, and called on the prime minister to uphold Israel's end of the Oslo agreements to prevent an escalation of violence.

Meretz head MK Yossi Sarid, Labor MK Ofir Pines, and Peace Now activist Galia Golan were among the speakers who decried the opening of the Hasmonean Tunnel.

Peace Now spokesperson Alon Arnon said that the route from Rabin's grave to Netanyahu's neighborhood was meant to demonstrate that there is a "straight line from the extremism that led to the murder of the leader of peace, to the wrong path being chartered by the current prime minister."

The battle for Joseph's Tomb

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Hundreds of Palestinian policemen and armed demonstrators stormed Joseph's Tomb in Nablus last week, killing six soldiers and wounding eight others. They ransacked parts of the yeshivah and then reportedly protected the Israeli soldiers like prisoners of war.

The IDF rushed an armored column to the outskirts of the city, but refrained from moving tanks into the Palestinian-controlled territory.

At one point, the IDF district brigade commander broke through to the 42 soldiers trapped inside the yeshivah, but suffered heavy casualties in the attempt.

The battle began when an angry mob stormed Joseph's Tomb in the morning, hurling anything that came to hand. They were joined by Palestinian policemen, who opened fire at the soldiers inside.

The soldiers called for help, but reinforcements came under a hail of stones and bullets, forcing them to abandon their vehicles. An IDF helicopter attempted to evacuate the wounded but was turned back by the heavy gunfire.

At one point, the mob attacking the Israeli pocket inside Nablus, the West Bank's largest city, overturned Border Police jeeps and set at least six of them and an APC alight.

Once the armored column reached the tomb, most of the wounded were treated and evacuated.

Palestinian witnesses said the Palestinian policemen were keeping many of the demonstrators away from the tomb and treating the Israeli wounded.

Other witnesses said residents later brought the soldiers soft drinks and water and gave them cellular telephones to call their families.

A Palestinian flag was said to be flying atop the tomb's dome, instead of the Israeli flag, witnesses said.

Dayan and OC Judea and Samaria Maj-Gen. Gabi Ofir negotiated with Jibril Rajoub, head of Palestinian Preventive Security, and Gen. Haj Ismail Jaber, West Bank police commander, to resolve the siege.

Fresh IDF troops later arrived to secure the tomb.

The Lowest Burial Cost Available from Any Jewish Establishment

When economy is a major consideration, you should know that Hebrew Basic Burial offers the lowest interment costs available from any Jewish establishment. Keeping burial costs low is in no way a negative reflection on either the family or the departed. Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

Congress accuses separatist of inciting hatred

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has lodged a complaint of incitement of hatred against former Front de Libération du Québec terrorist Raymond Villeneuve with the federal and provincial attorneys general.

CJC Quebec region chair Reisa Teitelbaum, referring to Villeneuve's warning that, after sovereignty, nationalists will remember that many Jews worked actively against independence and could face retaliation, said his remarks were racist and dangerous" and "a clear incitement to violence."

Montreal Urban Community police are already investigating Villeneuve's statements to determine if they constitute an indictable threat.

Mount Royal MP Sheila Finestone said the investigation is a "positive first step" in the case.

"But," she added, "the denunciation of statements by one-time terrorist Villeneuve must be made by citizens of Quebec from all walks of life, including Premier Lucien Bouchard, who up to now, has remained silent."

CJC drew attention to what it described as the "poisonous climate" in Quebec, where "the political debate has crossed the line and is veering toward scapegoating" of minorities and the Jewish community in particular.

Villeneuve, 58, who was sentenced to 12 years for manslaughter in 1963, after a bomb he planted killed a man, wrote in the newsletter of his Mouvement de liberation nationale du Quebec (MLNQ) that Ashkenazi Jews have played a leading role among those opposed to separation and Bill 101.

"With the latest escapades of (Howard) Galganov, it's too much. It is necessary to dare to denounce their inexplicable and incomprehensible hostility toward our people and its right to self-determination."

Alliance Quebec founders Eric Maldoff and Michael Goldbloom, Equality party leader Robert Libman and author Mordecai Richler are among those cited.

Villeneuve advises those "communities who have refused to be conciliatory toward the Quebecois people" to think about what will happen the day after a victory for sovereignty and suggests they "prepare now for a harmonious cohabitation."

The newsletter, La Tempete, claims a circulation of 250, but Villeneuve sent copies to the media — on Yom Kippur eve.

The next day on French-language radio, he said Alliance Quebec and English-rights leaders could become targets of bomb attacks.

CJC Quebec executive director Jack Jedwab said Villeneuve is "marginal," but "that does not mean that it is not important to pursue. We know from history what people of his ilk are capable of," adding that Jews will not be "intimidated."

CJC also called upon Bouchard to "clearly denounce" Villeneuve or else it fears the targeting of Jews for their political beliefs will only continue.

Jebwab said the Villeneuve outburst is the latest in a series of events in the last few weeks in which Quebec nationalists have singled out cultural communities, and in particular Jews, as the adversary. Equally "disturbing" to Jedwab are some French-language radio talk shows which have picked up and amplified this theme.

Among the most grievous, according to CJC, was the debut column of veteran hard-line separatists, Pierre Bourgault, in the Journal de Montreal Sept. 21, in which he attacks CJC for not responding to a demand from another ultra-nationalist Gilles Rheaume for a meeting to discuss Galganov.

Bourgault accuses CJC of "duplicity" for trying to stop American black Islamic leader Louis Farrakhan from speaking in Toronto, yet refusing to denounce Galganov, whose remarks are offensive to French Quebecers.

Jedwab, who noted that Rheaume had made no such request of CJC, criticized the Journal, which is owned by Pierre Peladeau, for hiring Bourgault, whom he called "xenophobic."

Meanwhile, B'nai Brith Canada (BBC), in a joint statement with the Black Coalition of Quebec and the Centre for Research-Action on Race Relations, urged Bouchard to make Quebec's hate laws more effective.

Cotler provides important lessons

Against the backdrop of the killing and the mayhem last week in Jerusalem, the West Bank and Gaza, a discussion of the state of human rights under the Palestinian Authority might seem somewhat surrealistic. But the two subjects are related.

There is no doubt that the violence, which erupted and then quickly, murderously escalated, reflected the mounting sense of frustration felt by Palestinians in their quest for meaningful self-rule. There is also no doubt that those frustrations are partly a result of the snail-like pace of the peace process. But this is only a small part of the story.

The deep frustration ominously coursing its way through Palestinian society in the self-governing areas is more deeply rooted. It has now been established beyond dispute that, along with the disappointment in the political process with Israel and the depressed economic situation, a major factor in the tension tugging on that society is the ongoing disregard by the Palestinian Authority itself for the simple, civic dignity and human rights of the people it is governing.

The Subcommittee on International Operations and Human Rights of the U.S. Congressional House Committee on International Relations convened this past summer to examine the condition of human rights for the Palestinian people living under the authority of Yasser Arafat.

One of the witnesses who was invited to testify before the American legislators was Irwin Cotler, professor of Law at McGill University.

Cotler is an expert on human rights and international law. That is the very least one can say about him, merely the starting point of a description. Cotler is to the discipline of human rights what wind and breeze are to sailing — a driving force by which progress is achieved and achievements are measured.

He is internationally recognized for his knowledge and his commitment to the advancement of human rights. His office at McGill University is not an academic sanctuary for quiet, reflective thinking and writing. It is rather a hive of student activity, a hub from whose kinetic centre, at any one moment, emanate a number of intersecting spokes of important domestic and international causes.

Indeed from time to time, he occupies many offices around the world including in Boston at Harvard University and in Jerusalem at Hebrew University. His first prominent appearance on the stage of international relations and human rights was perhaps his advocacy on behalf of Natan Sharansky two decades ago. At considerable risk, he personally served the procurator in Moscow with the 1,000-page defence factum which he had prepared for his refusnik client.

Since then, he has travelled countless times around the globe on fact-finding missions, lecture tours or as counsel to the oppressed, visiting not only "safe" western countries, where human rights are embedded into the deep structure of society, but also non-democratic despotisms and dictatorships, where human rights hang like abstract paintings in a gallery wall, talked about or looked at but never touched. His numerous human rights missions have taken him throughout the Middle East, to Israel and the territories of course, and to Egypt, Syrian Lebanon and Jordan.

In presenting argument, Cotler speaks in an unceasing staccato of logic, reason and passion. Hearing him address an audience can be compared to watching a master dismantle an elegant set of Russian dolls, continually refining a paradigm into a smaller, more perfect fractals of the original idea until it becomes an irreducible truth.

It says a great deal about him that one of his favorite words is "dialectics."

Cotler was invited by the subcommittee to testify in Washington on July 23. His testimony was based on incidents and events which had occurred in the West Bank and Gaza up to July 16. The new government of Israel had been in place for about a month.

As he explained in his testimony, a copy of which recently came across my desk, and which ran for 61 pages, the timing of the invitation to him was "particularly fortuitous [having] just returned from a visit to Israel, the West Bank and Gaza" where he "met and had discussions with a distinguished and representative group of Palestinian human rights monitors including Dr. Iyad Surraj, director-general of the Palestinian Citizens Commission on Human Rights; Raji Sourani, director of the Centre for Palestinian Rights in Gaza; Dr. Bassem Eid, who served for six years as director of field research for B'Tselem, the Israeli Information Centre for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories."

He also met with many Palestinian officials from the various levels of executive, legislative and judicial authority of the self-governing regions.

The "underlying and inspirational basis for [his] submission" was that "the promotion of democracy and the protection of human rights are indispensable to international peace and security ... History has shown, and international law affirms, that we shall either have both peace and human rights, or neither."

His purpose was to prove that the improvement of human rights for Palestinians was vitally important, not only for its own sake, but also for the sake of the peace striving to be born between Israel and the Palestinians.

Typically, Cotler's testimony to the subcommittee was a thorough, impeccably documented tour de force. It was organized around six themes. "First, a report on meetings and discussions with Palestinian human rights monitors and officials ... Second, an appreciation of Palestinian undertakings to respect human rights ... Third, a summary of human rights abuses under the Palestinian Authority drawn largely from Palestinian witness testimony and documentary evidence ... Fourth, an evaluation of Palestinian compliance with the Israel-PLO Accords ... Fifth, a check list of testing criteria for determining the state of human rights under Israeli or Palestinian jurisdiction. Sixth, a set of recommendations directed towards both the Palestinian Authority and the American and international community."

Cotler pulls no punches. He draws a straight line between the treatment of Palestinians at the hands of the Palestinian Authority and the future of peace between Palestinians and Israelis. With regard to the bloody events of last week, there are important lessons to be learned from Cotler's congressional testimony.

In the coming weeks I shall reproduce excerpts from it. MBD

Kalejs denies involvement in killing unit

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The cross examination of Konrad Kalejs began in earnest this past Monday at his deportation hearing, with the alleged Nazi war criminal denying he participated in anti-Jewish arrests or murders.

Under cross-examination by Justice Department lawyer Donald MacIntosh, Kalejs acknowledged he took part in a "self-defence unit" consisting of former Latvian army personnel, and he agreed that a Nov. 1941 document sent to the University of Riga claimed he "terrorized" Communists and members of the Soviet Red Army.

But Kalejs denied the unit arrested Jews or shot Communists, despite evidence of historians that such activities were common among Latvian self-defence units.

He disagreed with a report authored by SS General Stahlicker, read to him by MacIntosh, that local units cooperated with the Nazis, saying "we did not know what it means, Nazi." Kalejs said he knew the invaders as the German army, not Nazis.

He also disagreed with Stahlicker's report that local Latvian units initiated anti-Jewish pogroms. He answered, "I don't know" when MacIntosh suggested that many Latvians believed Jews supported the Soviet cause and were Communist leaders, though he said he knew of some people who were "mad at Jews."

Kalejs said his self-defence unit, operating in June and July 1941, "had much more important things to do than to pursue Jews." Instead, he said the unit pursued and terrorized the Red Army.

Later, he said the unit had few guns and almost no ammunition, and had pursued the Soviets by "scaring" them.

In earlier testimony last week, Kalejs claimed a simple request for a letter of reference from a member of "some kind of police" unit has resulted in years of "troubles" for him.

Had he not requested a special letter from a friend in that police unit, and had another letter testifying to his service in the Latvian military arrived on time, he could have avoided questions about his wartime service, he suggested.

Kalejs was testifying about events in November 1941, when he submitted a letter to a university in Riga indicating his service in the Arajs Kommando (AK). Kalejs said he was facing a deadline to apply to university and he obtained the letter from a friend who was a member of the police unit, but that the letter was "not true."

Under cross-examination, he was asked why he submitted the letter when he had in his possession a document certifying he had fought the Communists in a partisan unit in 1941, which would have been sufficient to gain entry to the university. He said he did it for "good measures" and that the first letter was "a lie of necessity."

He claimed he did not know the nature of the police unit, only that its members wore green uniforms with black armbands.

Kalejs made the claim during an immigration hearing last week. Federal authorities are attempting to deport Kalejs, who is an Australian citizen, for his alleged war crimes. In 1994, he was ordered removed by U.S. courts, which concluded he participated in the wartime persecution of civilians.

In his Toronto hearing, a host of former members of the Latvian Auxiliary Security Police, also known as the Arajs Kommando, have testified on videotape that Kalejs was a senior officer in the unit. Some have indicated that Kalejs' men took part in the murder of villagers.

However, in testimony last week, Kalejs denied membership in the unit — contrary to the November 1941 letter he signed and from which he attempted to distance himself. He also denied participating in murder, enslavement or kidnapping.

Instead, he painted a portrait of himself as a member of a church-going family who was brought up to live according to the Ten Commandments. He said he would not have been confirmed in the Lutheran Church if his pastor doubted his high ethical standards. He also claimed to have helped a Jewish family survive the Nazis.

Under questioning from his counsel, Win Thompson, Kalejs recounted numerous painstaking details of his life before and during the war.

He said he feared deportation to Siberia by the "godless" Red Army, so when German forces arrived in 1941, they were seen as "saviors."

At the time, he said, he did not know he'd be called upon to join the German war machine later in the war. Kalejs acknowledged he was a member of the Latvian Legion (more properly known as the Latvian Security Police Battalion), though he denied being part of the Waffen SS, which he said was restricted to Germans only.

Asked to identify two photographs of himself, Kalejs said one was taken when he graduated from Latvian military school but the other was a KGB forgery. "The uniform makes me suspicious. I never had a uniform with a star or collar," he said.

Kalejs also denied ever signing a list acknowledging receipt of cigarette rations. The list was entered as evidence earlier in the hearing to indicate Kalejs was a member of the Latvian Legion.

RCMP handwriting expert Joel Harris said the signatures were probably Kalejs'. But Kalejs denied the seven signatures were his, suggesting instead they were KGB forgeries.

Kalejs said that prior to the war, he befriended a Polish piano-player named Tracevskis. Tracevskis' wife, Raisa, and son, George, were Jewish but that didn't bother him because he believed in judging people by their character.

During the war, they came to him for help and he approached a former Latvian army comrade who was serving in the police. Through him, he obtained a document permitting Raisa and her son to live at home and avoid wearing a yellow star. As a result, they were able to survive the war, Kalejs said.

Federalists urged to stress Canada's greatness

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Quebecers must be convinced it is in their best interest to stay in Canada, the federal minister of Multiculturalism and the Status of Women told the recent annual meeting of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

But "no one said it's going to be an easy trip," Hedy Fry told some 200 council members.

Fry was responding to a question from Rabbi Jordan Pearlson, a longtime council member, who said some of the issues that have risen in Quebec — language inspectors and an increasingly monolothic, hostile atmosphere — "gnaw at us."

"We must continue to fight the fight," Fry responded. "We must continue to tell Quebec that it, too, is responsible for the richness and greatness and successes in Canada. We must go to the people of Quebec and tell them that."

Canadian Council of Christians and Jews President Ned Goodman presents Hedy Fry with the council's Good Servant Medal at its recent annual meeting. [Ron Csillag photo]

Quebecers must be persuaded that being part of Canada "is richer and more rewarding than walking away from it."

Part of the reason is that Canada is a "role model for the world" because of multiculturalism, Fry said in her prepared remarks.

In the 21st century, the world "will look to Canada [to learn about multiculturalism] because we will have done it."

Ottawa is "absolutely committed" to multiculturalism because it also has economic advantages, Fry said, notably in the $22 billion worth of foreign trade Canada expects to conclude in the next two years.

Canada is profiting from multiculturalism because "built into our advantage is our ability to recognize and respect other cultures."

We are probably the only country in the world to stress our differences in order to strengthen the whole, Fry said. The twin themes of unity and diversity are "a natural paradox for Canada to embrace."

Canada "has chosen the difficult route over the easy one. The amorphous melting pot — that's the easy route." Canadian multiculturalism "is not based on tolerance. Tolerance means you put up with something because you have no choice. It's based on respect."

Multiculturalism "is an inherent Canadian value. It has taught us certain skills in accommodation and conciliation, and that negotiation is a reasonable way of accepting our differences. We are seen as a people who are fair."

Keegstra fined $3,000

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Alberta Court of Appeal last week imposed a fine of $3,000 on former Eckville school teacher Jim Keegstra and would have sent him to jail for one year but for the unusually long delay that took place from the start of his trial to its conclusion.

The 12-year span from the time charges were laid in 1984 to last week's sentencing decision are mitigating factors "because of the added expense for the accused (Keegstra) and the extended anxiety for him and his family," the Appeal Court stated.

The three-judge court suspended the jail sentence and instead released Keegstra on one-year probation. It also imposed 200 hours of community service and an order not to preach hatred of the Jewish people, even under the guise of historical research.

The court decision was welcomed by Canadian Jewish Congress and the Calgary Jewish Community Council (CJCC).

"By increasing Keegstra's sentence, the Court of Appeal sent home the message that wilfully promoting hatred against any identifiable group is a serious offence," said Nate Feldman, president of the CJCC and a Congress representative in Alberta.

However, the sentence was criticized by Rubin Freedman of B'nai Brith Canada. "It's amazing the Alberta Court of Appeal has not yet received the message of the Supreme Court that promoting hate propaganda is illegal in Canada," he said.

In ordering Keegstra to perform 200 hours of community service, the court recommended that the beneficiaries be "those who have come to Canada as victims of racial, religious or ethnic hatred elsewhere."

Congress president Goldie Hershon responded to that suggestion by stating "is unredeemable. We would not want him engaged in community service in our community. He has nothing to offer."

Ex-Airborne officer unconcerned by swastika

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The tolerance shown by the Canadian Airborne Regiment's former discipline officer to soldiers wearing swastika tattoos was fairly typical of the Canadian military's attitude towards racists at the time, according to a spokesperson for Canadian Jewish Congress.

At the same time that former Sgt. Maj. Bud Jardine found no racist element in swastika tattoos, other Armed Forces officers were tolerating the display of a Confederate rebel flag in a soldiers' barracks. Jardine also said other officers knew of the swastika tattoos and did nothing about it, said Keith Landy, counsel for Congress.

'It's no surprise Somalis were killed'

"If you look at the pattern of the soldiers' behavior, then see the attitude of the officers who failed to read the signals, it's no surprise Somalis were killed," Landy added.

Jardine's comments came during cross-examination by Landy during a recent hearing of the Somalia inquiry in Ottawa. Jardine said he was aware soldiers sported the tattoos but he did not believe the tattoos were a symbol of racism or undermined discipline.

"To me, in this day and age, no, it doesn't bother me at all that people would have a tattoo on their arm," Jardine said. "It symbolizes their belief, not mine."

Jardine's comment was "shocking" and displayed "a lack of understanding and a tolerance for racist views," said Bernie Farber, Congress' director of community relations.

Farber said Jardine's admission "illustrates our point, that there were individuals on the fringe who held racist views and who shouldn't belong in the Armed Forces of Canada."

It also indicates that the military "didn't take [the issue] seriously," he added.

Since the Somalia incidents, in which members of the Airborne Regiment killed young Somalis, the Armed Forces have enacted regulations against manifestations of racism, Farber said.

Four recruits who possessed racist materials were drummed out of the service, he said.

Congress, which has full status to cross-examine witnesses, will continue to participate in the inquiry to ensure the full story of racism in the military is told, Farber added.

Israel's new ambassador arrives

OTTAWA — Israel's new ambassador to Canada, David Sultan, arrived here last Thursday, and will present his credentials to Governor General Romeo LeBlanc in a formal ceremony at Rideau Hall Oct. 17.

Sultan, 58, served as Israel's ambassador to Egypt for the past four years. In press reports last week, he referred to the Egyptian posting as the most challenging job in the foreign service.

Born in Egypt, he served at Israel's embassy in Cairo as deputy head of mission from 1983-85. He has also served as Israel's ambassador to Italy.

Sultan said he's looking forward to his Ottawa posting, especially in light of the recently-signed Canada-Israel free trade pact, which could generate "huge potential for benefit to both sides."

Tunnel pretext

The opening of the tunnel exit was but a pretext for the fighting last week.

The bloody rioting by Palestinians in Jerusalem, the West Bank and Gaza, which continued for three days and which claimed the lives of 70 people including 14 Israelis, was not spontaneous.

That was the conclusion of Israel's Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak. "There is no doubt that the incidents which took place in all the central cities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza were certainly not spontaneous, but initiated incidents."

A reconstruction of last week's events confirms his assesssment.

The "eruptions" were too widespread, involving all the main population centres, and appeared to ignite as if on signal.

They followed the same pattern. Civilians initiated the action by hurling stones at the IDF and then were joined by both uniformed and non-uniformed Palestinian police who began shooting.

They occured on cue. After a meeting of the PLO executive committee and the Palestine Authority (PA) cabinet last Wednesday, the first day of the fighting, Mohammed Nashashibi, PA finance minister, told reporters that Arafat and the cabinet had approved "escalation by all means" in the territories. As reported in the Israeli press, Arafat accused Israel of "escalation" against the Palestinian people. "The most important thing," he said, "is we can't accept the Judaization of Jerusalem. East Jerusalem is our capital." The cause of the rioting was clear: to bring more pressure to bear on the government of Israel and to attempt, yet again, to undermine Israel's sovereignty over unified Jerusalem. Thus, the plan to open the new exit/entrance to the Hashmonean tunnel, which was known to the Palestinian authorities months before and to which thay had agreed, could hardly have been the religious affront that they decried to the western world. But it certainly was a convenient excuse to launch a renewed media campaign against Israel.

There is no denying that Palestinians do indeed feel a growing impatience with the Netanyahu government. But violent mayhem cannot be a balm for that impatience. Reaching for an automatic weapon is not the way to resolve differences. When the battle is joined by thugs and hooligans, the shooting cannot be stopped as easily as it can be started. The fighting has encouraged Hamas and Islamic Jihad, the radical, hateful fundamentalists, to announce that they will once again try to perpetrate more killings upon the people of Israel through renewed intifadah and suicide bombings. Is this the path on which Arafat plans to take the peace process?

From the response of the western public to last week's events, one could say that Arafat's calculations had partially succeeded. Most western governments, including, regrettably, the Canadian government, have condoned the instigators and inciters of the violence and condemned Israel. In their reflexively simplistic responses, they have set a terrible precedent, encouraging confrontation across the scope of a gun rather than confrontation across a table.

But the response which counts most in the search for an enduring bilateral peace is not that of the western public. It is that of the Israeli public. Here, Arafat has miscalculated badly.

It is true that many Israelis, a large number of whom voted for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, also feel discouraged and frustrated that the peace process appears to have halted. But with all their frustration, they are now concerned and troubled anew by what last week's events revealed of the PA leader. If Arafat deliberately plotted the rioting and the killing, then he cannot be trusted because the sanctity of life means nothing to him. On the other hand, if he planned "only" the rioting and not the killing, and lost control when the shooting started, then he cannot be trusted because he is ineffectual. Either way, the confidence of the Israeli public in the achievability of peace continues to erode, and thus, too, the chances of building that peace.

Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

Sept. 29, 1738 Esther Brandeau, daughter of refugees from the Portuguese Inquisition, sailed to New France in disguise, calling herself Jacques La Farge. She was sent back. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC)

Dispute poses threat to all Jews

As a concerned Jew, I find B'nai Brith Canada's continued assault on Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) potentially harmful. In fact, headlines portraying the CJC and the Office de la Langue Francaise (OLF) agreement over kosher products as "secret" incite political rhetoric damaging the integrity of these much needed Jewish organizations of our community. Is this what we want as a minority group of Quebec? It is enough that Jews must combat the provincial government for their communal rights (as in the so-called Matzahgate case). Is it really necessary to divide the community politically?

It is no dark secret that both the CJC and B'nai Brith have had their rifts in the past. In any case, this "kosher" issue seems to be not too kosher at all. Furthermore, to determine a community concensus, I do not think it is necessary that every organization or community member agree on a position taken on a particular issue. The fact is, the CJC had reached an agreement with the Communaute Sepharade du Quebec and the Vaad Ha'ir, which comprises the majority concensus of the Montreal Jewish community.

I fear the potentially harmful consequences of unproductive remarks targeted amongst Jewish community organizations. Political divisiveness will only weaken the Jewish community when it is obligated to fight for its rights in the future.

Wants Jonathan Pollard freed

Raoul Wallenberg was left to his cruel fate, but there is a present day "Raoul Wallenberg," His name is Jonathan Pollard and he is rotting in prison.

I am waiting and will continue to wait for a Lamed Vovnik or even more than one, to come forward. I would like to hear a voice of outrage against this present-day injustice.

If all of us band together, Jonathan Pollard can be freed!

Hungarian Jews won fencing medals

On the subject of Jewish Olympic medal winners, which Hungary supplied in a number disproportionate to its population size, that country stood out for its prowess in fencing.

At the only Olympic Games held in Nazi Germany in 1936 when I was a teenager there, a unique event occurred, unlikely to be repeated. In women's fencing, all three medals were won by Jews. Ilona Elek of Hungary won gold, Helene Mayer (who accepted an invitation to come back from the United States to compete for Germany) won silver, and Ellen Reis of Austria won bronze. Elek won another gold in 1948 in London and silver in 1952 in Helsinki.

New Day School in Toronto

For some reason our school was not mentioned in the article on tuition fees in day schools (CJN, Sept. 12).

Tuition in junior kindergarten in our school this year is $3,250 (half a day) and in grades senior kindergarten and up (full day), $6,800.

Reporter's note: The CJN*'s story discussed tuition fees only at schools affiliated with the Toronto Board of Jewish Education (BJE). The Toronto Heschel School, with about 50 students, just recently got off the ground, and may apply for BJE affiliation only after two years of operation.*

Ostry an officer of ORT Canada

I was pleased to see the results of my interview with Sheldon Kirshner in a recent issue (CJN, Sept. 5). However, I confess I am very surprised that there was no mention in the article that I hold the position of honorary president of ORT Canada, and in fact have been for several years a member of the Academic Advisory Council of World ORT, which meets annually in England. Such an omission has a serious connotation for me and for ORT Canada.

The ancient discipline

Scribes' craft ensures Judaism's sacred objects

By RABBI ELIE BENZAQUEN

The Torah scroll is perhaps the holiest of the physical objects in our faith and it is an exact replica of the very same scroll Moshe our teacher wrote following the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai over 3,300 years ago. It contains the words, thought, and will of G-d, the basis of our entire raison d'etre as a nation, a moral foundation for all mankind.

So valued and precious is the Torah that the laws surrounding its care and treatment are almost like considering it as a living being with a soul of its own. We celebrate a Torah's coming into existence or arrival in a community with great joy, and G-d forbid, in a fire, we'll risk our lives to save it. Should a Torah be damaged beyond repair, Heaven forfend, the community will bury it with a proper funeral.

Just like a living being, the sefer Torah too is made up of physical material, but is only "alive" when its "soul" is united with it. Just as there are laws of nature that dictate what needs must be met to maintain life, such as oxygen, food, proper connections throughout the body, so too, must certain laws be met and maintained for the Torah to be kosher, "fit for use." Only when the sefer Torah is kosher, may the community fulfil its obligation to read from it and make blessings over it.

The tools of the scribe are simple and the ones I use in my work as a sofer (scribe) are the same as those used over the centuries by my predecessors. A duck or goose feather, or a bamboo reed, finely cut and honed to a surgically precise tip is the pen I use to create the individually formed letters. The ink is formulated with the same three basic natural ingredients that have been used over the centuries. The surface is parchment, made of the skin of a kosher animal that has been cleaned, treated and finely sanded to an ivory smooth finish. The parchment is cut to size and lined. When the work on a number of sheets is completed, the scribe will sew the sheets together at the ends with a thread made of kosher animal sinews.

There remains a fifth and most important ingredient that is intrinsic if not fundamental to the creation of a kosher Torah scroll. The intent and concentration of the scribe throughout the entire process must be in accordance with the laws governing the writing of a holy article, whether it be a sefer Torah, t'fillin or mezuzah scroll. The thoughts a scribe has while writing do in fact affect the validity of that writing, and indeed the entire Torah, for if even one letter in the Torah is written without the required accompanying intent and concentration (kavanah), the entire sefer Torah is passul (invalid).

There are 27 letters in the Hebrew alphabet, each having its own particular form and details which must be correctly inscribed. No less than 165 different regulations govern the shapes of these letters, yet if even one of them is incorrectly formed, the entire Torah is rendered passul. The laws governing the creation of a sefer Torah are many and detailed, and the scribe must be well versed in them, but even more importantly, he must be conscientious and G-d fearing, for only the scribe himself can be sure if the writing was done with the correct kavanah. It is for this reason the scribe chosen must be well recommended and researched when one is considering the purchase of "STaM" (sefer Torah, t'fillin and mezuzot.

The Reassuring Touch,* charcoal on paper, by Elie Benzaquen.

While a certain artistic talent and skill are necessary to write an esthetically pleasing script, the more important factor of conscientiousness on the part of the scribe is what is really sought after by the serious Torah connoisseur and purchaser.

Even before a single letter is put down, the factor of kavanah comes into play. From the time the animal skin begins being prepared for use, whether it be for a Torah page or for a t'fillin or mezuzah scroll, this process must be carried out with that expressed purpose in mind and must be vocalized as well (l'shem mitzvah). When the lines are individually embossed on the parchment as a guide upon which the scribe will write, they, too, must be done with the expressed intention of l'shem mitzvah.

When the scribe dips his pen into the inkwell, he must intone to himself the letters he is about to form and the words that will result are all for the sake of the mitzvah of Torah (or t'fillin or mezuzah).

On top of that, when the scribe is about to write one of the Holy Names of G-d, he must again intone that the Names are holy and that they are being written with that knowledge and expressed purpose in mind.

Furthermore, an additional requirement is that each letter be correctly written in the exact sequence that it appears in the original. This law is referred to as the law of Kesidran and it is a law that poses great difficulties, for if one were to mistakenly omit a letter and only discover the mistake later, after having written a number of lines, the only way to correct the mistake would be to erase all successive lines back to the point where the error occurred and only then begin anew. The obvious difficulty with this law is that if the scribe wrote one of the holy Names of G-d following his mistake, he would be forbidden to erase backward to make the correction, and the entire page would then be rendered passul and uncorrectable.

If all this leaves one in wonderment regarding the feasibility of producing a kosher Torah, the rabbis' of Talmud themselves agonized over this last problem. They came to the conclusion that some opening must be found regarding the law of Kesidran. Otherwise we would never have a kosher Torah scroll! This law, however, remains in force as it applies to the writing of t'fillin or mezuzah scrolls.

Every reliable scribe will have a collection of uncorrectable mezuzot, and ironically, one can measure the honesty of a scribe by requesting to see his non-kosher mezuzot! If he has none, one might wonder if and how the mistakes were ever corrected, for everyone will make some mistakes at some point in time.

One can understand that the temptation would be great for a scribe to simply make a correction in the place where a mistake occurs without erasing the successive lines, and no one would be able to tell if the correction was done properly. The mezuzah would appear to be kosher but would be as unkosher as a one printed on paper. Whether it was done out of ignorance or greed, the article bought by the unsuspecting buyer would be as valid as a burglar alarm that does not sound the alarm when triggered!

Many people understand the importance of having a mezuzah to protect their homes, just as the sign on the doorposts protected the Jewish people from harm when the angel of death "passed-over" their homes in Egypt. It is unfortunate that many place more importance on the design and appearance of the outer casing than on the infinitely more significant contents. I once received a call with a request for "inserts" for mezuzot! It is a matter of understanding our priorities. Do we pay more attention to the core of the matter or merely to the superficial externalities that surround it?

As an artist, I can easily relate to the idea of giving "life" to a object that was inanimate. Compare the blank face of the canvas before Rembrandt applied his brush with one of the self portraits that he created. In his own way, Rembrandt created life that remains alive over 300 years later.

In my charcoal work The Reassuring Touch, I have sought not only to bring life to a blank piece of paper, but also to convey the warmth and security the old Yemenite Jew feels as he touches the mezuzah on his doorpost. His grandaughter watches the ancient custom of acknowledging the mezuzah. She recognizes it as an act of deep feeling which she in turn will emulate and pass on to her own children and grandchildren.

And so, whether it is the t'fillin that we personally don as an everlasting testimonial and connection to G-d and the Jewish people, or the mezuzot that mark our homes with holiness, or the ultimate sanctity of the sefer Torah that binds us as a community and as a people, it is through the ancient discipline of the scribe that an ancient people maintains its sacred objects. Holding fast to these objects and lovingly renewing their holiness in each generation will ensure the continuity of this ancient people for all times to come.

Jewish presence rooted in Prague

PRAGUE DIARY: PART II

Our interest is caught by a postcard on the rack of a shop: "Kafka and Svejk," it reads, with a picture of Franz Kafka lifting a glass of Czech Pilsner to the health of the everyman soldier/layabout of The Good Soldier Schweik.

By Jean M. Gerber

What is the connection between Prague and its Jews? We set out to find out. We begin at the old town square, which our guide calls the "parlor of the nation." Buildings writhing with rococo ornamentation stand on ninth century vaults. Among this restless abundance of lavish ornamentation, the soul of the Czech nation resides, just as does the soul of Jewry at the Western Wall Plaza.

Everyone comes here, we are told, if only to see the famous clock featuring an hourly procession of apostles while a skeleton chimes the hour. Across the square, the Communist regime proclaimed victory in 1948. Crosses in the bricks mark the place where Czech national leaders were shot in the 17th century, and dominating the landscape is the monument to national hero John Hus.

Where is the Jewish connection? Our guide points to the Kafka House. Kafka spent 90 percent of his lifetime within one mile of the square. His home, school and parents' store were nearby; his dark days as a clerk were reflected in his tale Metamorphosis, as well as his life as an intellect, spent in cafes along the river (now the site of the Intercontinental Hotel). Kafka was himself a child of the Emancipation.

Beginning in the 18th century, Jews moved into the social, economic and intellectual life of the country. Kafka practised little of his religion formally, but regarded his Jewish identity as the basis, for good or ill, of his writing. Reflected in it is the labyrinthine nature of the city with its winding streets and alleys, as well as the looming castle across the river from the old town, our destination.

We cross the Charles Bridge with its posturing statues and pause in front of a crucifix. The cross is surrounded, astonishingly, with Hebrew lettering in gold: Kadosh, kadosh, kadosh, Adonai tzeva'ot, it reads.

Supposedly a Jew, fined for showing disrespect for the cross, was made to pay for the statue and added a Hebraic touch!

Crossing the bridge, we stand in the shadow of the castle on the Vltava/Moldau River. The original Jewish settlement of the ninth and 10th centuries was below its walls until fire and war forced it across the river. Few Jews, however, approached the castle after the Hapsburgs took power. This lengthy reign was hard on the Czechs and even worse for the Jews, who bore expulsion and return many times.

The worst was Queen Maria Theresa. A rabid anti-Semite, she came to power determined to be rid of the Jews. So out of Prague they went, into neighboring towns. Imagine her chagrin when after a few years the townspeople themselves begged for the return of the Jews. As our guide laconically observes, "They missed the custom of the Jews."

So back the Jews came, and as an expression of their gratitude to the witch on the throne, they prepared a banner, now hanging in the Maisel Synagogue, showing her royal self enthroned and surrounded by troops of soldiers.

Whose fingers, I wonder, had to sew this ironic thank you note? What she could not accomplish, the town named after her did: Theresienstadt, the city of Theresa.

Our guide begins to speak of his own experiences as a Czech Jew, growing up a few blocks from the castle. He felt at home until his boyhood was cut short by the German occupation. One of the 100 out of 15,000 children to survive Terezin, he saw Hitler enter the castle and look out over the defeated town.

He recalls the carpet-bombing of Dresden that shook the ground. "To us it was a symphony, those bombers a beautiful sight."

After liberation, he went to Israel and fought (with Czech-made weapons) in the War of Independence. "Those Czech arms made Israel possible", he tells us.

After years abroad, he has returned home. Why have so few Czech Jews returned since the overthrow of communism? Well, they have families rooted in a new place. He has none. Is anti-Semitism a fact in the new country? Never has he experienced it. Today Jews serve in the government and other posts without stigma.

The ghetto is truly gone, and so are its Jews. Wandering in the gardens of the castle, I pause by a stake that has writing in four languages, Russian, Czech, Japanese and English. "Peace," it reads. "May peace prevail on earth."

A moving tribute to Wallenberg

Although he was a much travelled person who studied in Germany, France and the United States, Raoul Wallenberg did not, as far as I know, ever make it to Canada. However, this savior of 100,000 Jews (and their descendants) in wartime Budapest in 1944-45, now has a permanent home in this country, a posthumous honor conferred upon him through sculptor Ernest Raab's dramatic bust of the great Swedish diplomat unveiled in a moving ceremony in Toronto's Earl Bales Park last month.

By Arnold Ages

That ceremony, which had its beginning just two years ago as a worthy idea in the mind of Goldie Steiner Raab, the organizer of the memorial day activities, came to fruition in front of almost a 1,000 people on a somewhat misty and cloudy day in September — the weather itself cooperating in the solemnity of the moment. For those assembled there, it was an epoch-making event, listening to Wallenberg's sister, Nina Lagergren, describe the human face of a man who has assumed a larger-than-life image in the saga of European Jewry during the Holocaust.

It has taken more than 50 years for the Wallenberg monument to be dedicated in Toronto, although it must be said that international committees have been active in the last decade in trying to tell his story and in pressuring the Soviet Union and now Russia to reveal what is known about his ignominious arrest, incarceration and fate in the Soviet gulag.

During the Soviet period, officials first denied any knowledge of Wallenberg, then issued vague statements about his whereabouts in the post World War II period and indicated only that he had died in captivity — this, despite periodic reports from exprisoners that he had been seen.

The situation has improved only marginally since the collapse of communism and we are still in ignorance about the exact circumstances surrounding Wallenberg's fate. There can never be closure on the Wallenberg file until this information is secured. Petitions directed at President Boris Yeltsin in this regard were circulated during the Wallenberg memorial ceremony.

It is one of the more subtle ironies of modern history that Canada — whose wartime immigration policy towards Jews fleeing Hitler was perhaps the worst of what Emil Fackenheim has called the "half democracies" — should be the country that has made Wallenberg its only honorary citizen. The honor is doubly shared by a Canada which has changed for the better in the last half century and by Wallenberg, whose sterling example of personal courage helped pierce the darkness of that terrible period when the swastika almost blotted out the sun.

Recognizing Wallenberg in 1996 is important during a period when researchers are examining ever more closely the Nazi stain that besmirched the conscience of the West between 1933 and 1945. Recent books by professors Daniel Goldhagen (Hitler's Collaborators) and William Brustein (The Social Origins of the Nazi Party) suggest that the racist and anti-Semitic ideology which fuelled the Holocaust was more pervasive in German society than has hitherto been believed. The evidence is not fully in, but a persuasive case can now be made to the effect that Nazism and the Holocaust were not merely "aberrations" of German history, but in part a logical result of decades of German anti-Semitism.

In view of the sobering and realistic picture of the past, the personal, moral example of Wallenberg stands out in stark relief against the inertia, indifference and ambivalence of governments and societies. As Prof. Irwin Cotler mentioned in his stirring address at the memorial, Wallenberg individually saved more Jews than any government or agency, and personified the Talmudic dictum that "he who saves one life saves the world."

The news media have reported that film personalities Barbra Streisand and Peter Bogdanovitch will be in Toronto this fall for a six-part series entitled Rescuers — which will deal with gentiles who saved Jews during World War II. It would be appropriate for them to visit Raab's visual, moving tribute to Wallenberg, the righteous man who rescued past, present and future generations of Jews.

Blacks & Jews

The ruckus that developed around the appearance of Louis Farrakhan in Toronto did not add to our yontef mood. Inside the hall, he said that he was not anti-Semitic, but at the door they sold anti-Semitic literature. It is no wonder that Jews feel uneasy about him, and I wish that circumstanes were otherwise.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

I remember fondly the days — only 30 years ago — when blacks and Jews marched together, stood together, worked together, when Martin Luther King preached in the pulpit at Holy Blossom Temple and emphasized the close relationship that Jews had with those who were underprivileged.

I was happy, therefore, to note that at least one American group is taking this problem seriously. The American Jewish Committee and Howard University (a black university) are now publishing a new magazine, the first edition of which appeared on my desk a few weeks ago. It is called CommonQuest and has the subtitle The Magazine of Black-Jewish Relations.

Somehow it seemed to speak directly to me — not only because I have been given a fair amount of my own life to this enterprise, but because the major article and magazine hit very close to home.

The article I refer to is called Atlanta 1958: No Middle Ground:

"On Oct. 12, 1958, the detonation of five sticks of dynamite in the oldest synagogue in Atlanta echoed with the admonitions of one of the South's pre-eminent rabbis, that 'there is only one real issue, civil rights.' "

I have every reason to remember that October day very well, for it is my wife's birthday and we happened to celebrate in St. Paul (where we lived at the time) by having a special guest, a friend of our younger days staying with us. Rabbi Jacob Rothchild of Atlanta was our scholar-in-residence. It was on that weekend that his temple was bombed, and CommonQuest features excerpts from a new book by Melissa Fay Greene, The Temple Bombing.

In the book, she describes how the Jews of the South, and of Atlanta especially, felt about blacks and the pervasive segregation problem. The rule was, "Keep a low profile." But then came Rabbi Rothchild who — on assuming the pulpit in 1946 — began preaching about the need to stand up and acknowledge that Jews and blacks had a common cause.

The author of the book credits the rabbi with turning not only the Jewish community towards civil rights but the general community as well. The attack on his temple was undoubtedly engineered by people who wanted to abort or at least slow the process of integration. But the voice of Rabbi Rothchild helped to turn the tide.

It is no accident that so many of the people who went on freedom rides and exposed themselves to danger were Jews. My own late brother, Walter, was one of them.

I hope the magazine is successful and that it will gain readers in Canada as well. Doing the right thing for our community is a religious command, and we should let no one — not even Farrakhan — deter us

The Kirshner File

Festival films are a mixed lot

Films of Jewish interest were screened at the recent Toronto International Film Festival. Some were better than others.

By Sheldon Kirshner

Virtually all these movies will be released commercially in theatres across Canada. Watch for them.

In recent years, the Australian movie industry has carved out a niche for itself on the international market. Just think of Gillian Armstrong's My Brilliant Career or Baz Luhrmann's Strictly Ballroom.

Now you can add Scott Hicks' Shine to that honorable list. A low-budget crowd pleaser, Shine is an extraordinary real-life drama framed by the trauma of the Holocaust and the soaring notes of Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3.

The film revolves around the eccentric figure of David Helfgott (played by a succession of accomplished actors from Alex Rafalowicz and Noah Taylor to Geoffrey Rush), whose talents at the keyboard are recognized when he is all but seven years old. David's teacher, his father Elias Peter (Armin Mueller-Stahl), is a Polish Jew whose family was murdered by the Nazis. Elias Peter wants the best for his son, but being domineering and possessive, he stifles and alienates him.

Shine, which takes place during a period from the 1950s to the 1980s, charts David's odyssey from child prodigy in Sydney and student at London's Royal College of Music to his mental breakdown and inspirational recovery.

The performances are first-rate. Mueller-Stahl, a German actor with a penchant for portraying tormented Jewish characters, plays a man who is so haunted by the Holocaust that he denies David the training he requires to perfect his skills. Sir John Gielgud is impressive as David's unconventional tutor, while Lynn Redgrave projects a rare radiance as the remarkable woman who takes a shine to David.

A superior film in all respects, Shine is intelligent, heart-breaking and uplifting. And the thundering "Rach 3" piece leaves a memorable impression.

By any criterion, The Substance of Fire, directed by Daniel Sullivan, will be regarded as a winner.

Isaac Geldhart (Ron Rifkin), a New York City publisher whose boyhood was scarred by the sight of his family herded away by the Germans, devotes himself to the printed word and to serious, high-minded books, particularly about the Holocaust. He scoffs at popular works which might appeal to a mass audience. But Isaac, stubborn to the core, does not seem to realize that his marketing strategy is driving his respected company into bankruptcy.

Isaac's pragmatic son, Aaron (Tony Goldwyn), tries to convince him to publish his friend's manuscript, which he judges to be a potential best-seller, a commodity the firm has lacked for six years. Isaac rejects the proposal and goes ahead with plans to put out two books with little sales value — The Architecture of the Holocaust and The Science of Genocide, a four-volume, handsomely-bound work written by a cranky acquaintance who has spent three decades on the project.

Utterly frustrated by his father's obstinacy, Aaron enlists the help of his siblings to dissuade Isaac. Sarah (Sarah Jessica Parker), an actress, and Martin (Timothy Hutton), a teacher with a debilitating disease, side with Aaron in the inevitable showdown, and the family is torn asunder.

The Substance of Fire, powered by a brilliant performance from Rifkin and empathetic portrayals from the supporting cast, emerges as a strong, compelling film about the memory of the Holocaust and the anguish of inter-generational strife.

By turns idiosyncratic and burlesque, Conversation with the Beast marks Armin Mueller-Stahl's turn as a director. Regrettably, it is not an auspicious debut.

Arnold Webster (Bob Balaban), a timid American historian, arrives in Berlin to interview a 103-year-old recluse claiming to be Adolf Hitler (Mueller-Stahl). He is attended to by his sexy young wife, Hortense (Katharina Bohm), who humors him.

More often than not confined to a wheelchair, the man purporting to be Hitler claims that his body double committed suicide and that no one after 1945 believed he was Hitler. The man-who-would-be Hitler boasts of his magical powers and sexual prowess, declares that he was forced into the war by "Jewish statesmen," confesses that the German people gave him heartburn, claims that he lost the war because of incompetent aides and proclaims his immortality.

As he rants on, Webster speculates about the true identity of his interlocutor. The mystery, such as it is, cannot sustain the film, which is inappropriately playful. What suspense there is vanishes long before Conversation with the Beast flickers off the screen.

Volker Schlondorff's The Ogre, yet another German film which trades on Germany's Nazi-era guilt, suffers from a similar malaise. All but bereft of conflict and tension, it elicits only a modicum of interest.

John Malkovich plays the role of Abel, a simple, kind-hearted French soldier who finds himself in a German prisoner-of-war camp. Assigned to Hermann Goering's sumptuous hunting lodge, Abel thrives in his new environment. As the Third Reich totters, Abel becomes an attendant at an SS preparatory school in a castle, the seat of an old family headed by an aristocrat (Armin Mueller-Stahl) contemptuous of the Nazis.

Magical powers

At the request of the resident Nazi race theorist, Abel roams the countryside, rounding up boys of pure Aryan lineage. And although Abel is usually incapable of drawing moral distinctions, he defies his masters by saving a Jewish boy from certain death.

Whether regarded as a kind of a fable or as a fairy tale, The Ogre, notwithstanding several chilling scenes which grip the heart, is invariably disappointing.

The only Israeli film at this year's festival, The Arena of Murder unfolds as a bleak meditation on Israeli society following Yitzhak Rabin's assassination.

Amos Gitai's free-form documentary, an amalgam of formal interviews, casual conversations, excerpts from a rock concert and current news clips, portrays Israel as deeply fragmented.

Politically, Gitai is a leftist, and this perspective informs and permeates The Arena of Murder, an unconventional film by any yardstick.

Jerusalem, Bille August's three-hour Swedish marathon, blends several grand themes: religious piety and zealotry, faith and unrequited love. Adapted from Selma Lagerlof's epic novel, which itself is based on a true story, Jerusalem is set in the late 19th century in rural Sweden and in Ottoman Palestine.

The plot turns on a young man whom fate has given a cruel hand: either marry his beloved and follow her to an unknown life in the Holy Land, or remain in the quiet village in which he was raised.

As brooding as an unrelieved northern landscape, Jerusalem is a palette of contrasting colors, juxtaposing the bluish cold of Scandinavia against the mellow browns of the Judean desert. Distinguished by a fine cast, the film sustains itself over a course of dramatic twists and turns, but ultimately lacks the power of August's 1988 tour de force, Pelle the Conqueror.

Dancing, joy a part of Simchat Torah

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

In the Torah, the holiday of Simchat Torah has no special mitzvot. There is no sukkah, no lulav, no mention other than of a yom tov with the regular holiness and cessation from work.

However, we know Simchat Torah as a day of singing and dancing with the Torah, circling the bimah seven times and reading various verses from the Torah. This is not a mitzvah from the Torah, but rather it is a minhag, a custom or practice that has been adopted by the entire Jewish people.

The difference between a mitzvah and a minhag is its origins. A mitzvah is a commandment from the Commander, G-d, telling us what He expects of us. A minhag is us expressing what we want to say and to do. A minhag expresses our feelings of joy or sadness, or appreciation or whatever feelings we happen to have.

The minhag of wearing a kittel on Yom Kippur expresses our feelings of mortality and vulnerability. The minhag of saying Kabbalat Shabbat with Lecha Dodi expresses our desire to properly prepare for the holiness of Shabbat, based on a practice of some of the great scholars of the Talmud. The minhag of singing Adon Olam at the end of Shabbat morning services is as if to say that we do not find the services burdensome, the minute they are over we are out the door, but rather we will sit for a moment, like standing at the door saying goodbye to your hosts, not running out the door the minute the dinner is over.

On Simchat Torah, we Jews want to dance. We aren't commanded. We want to express our joy, our appreciation, the love that we feel for the Torah and all the beauty in it. This is the Jew speaking.

The Halachah states that on all the yamim tovim, if a person wanted to forgo eating and drinking and spend the entire day in t'fillah, in prayer and in learning, he would have that option — except for Shavuot, the day of the giving of the Torah. On Shavuot, we must eat and drink, spending half the day for our enjoyment and the other in prayer and eating and drinking. The Torah must be accompanied by pleasure, by enjoyment and gladness. On Simchat Torah, the day in which there is no mitzvah, we fill it with our feelings of love for the Torah.

Simchat Torah and Shavuot are partners in our love for the Torah. Shavuot has no mitzvah that we perform; so we learn the Torah all night — a minhag, an expression of our love for the learning of Torah. On Simchat Torah, a day of no mitzvah, we dance with the Torah. Shavuot is intellect, Simchat Torah is emotions.

May we all be filled with joy and love of the Torah on Simchat Torah and throughout the coming year.

You really think the wind is a sukkah's only problem?

By JORDAN MAX

Guest Voices

Once upon a time, in a cold and forbidding country called Canada, there lived a young family in a small northern town. Now the father was a real shlemazel, who was not very good with home repairs, much less construction. However, as the holiday of Sukkot was approaching, he decided to build a sukkah of wood and cloth in his backyard, and when it was finished, he was very pleased with his work.

Then the neighbors, who were by now very confused, called the Building Department to investigate this apparent zoning bylaw violation, but that is another story.

Well, the first night of Sukkot finally arrived. But along came the Big Bad Wind from the North, and it just laughed and blew and tore his lovely wood-and-cloth sukkah to shreds. And the shlemazel was very upset, for his ego was sorely bruised. He resolved to build a bigger, stronger sukkah the next year. But just in case, he moved his family further south to a house in Thornhill, where surely there was a warmer climate with less wind.

All that year, he toiled long and hard in his spare time, designing his new sukkah. It would be bigger, it would use more wood and thick tarps to keep out the cold and it would be anchored in kosher gelatin, the hardest material known to man, that is, next to Aunt Zelda's matzah balls. Finally, he finished his sukkah and it looked very beautiful. The sukkah survived two days until the Big Bad Wind came calling.

The Big Bad Wind was very cross with the shlemazel, for it had not been able to find him since he had moved. The Big Bad Wind blew great gusts at the second sukkah, but the tarps held. And the Big Bad Wind laughed a mighty laugh and blew again, twisting the wood frames until they were reduced to matchsticks. The shlemazel was distraught, but resolved more than ever that he would triumph over the Big Bad Wind the next year.

So the shlemazel consulted with his rabbi, engineers, "bildners," and other sukkah owners. Not only would he build a windproof all-wood sukkah, but it would also be a feat of engineering. And the shlemazel bought power tools and worked on the sukkah all year and tested it in wind tunnels, and he saw that it was very, very strong and beautiful. And he assembled the sukkah and bolted it to his house. Finally, when all was done, his children decorated the sukkah and people came from miles away to marvel at his creation, even though it did not have a retractable roof.

On the first night of Sukkot, the shlemazel and his family sat in the Mighty Sukkah, and who should arrive but the Big Bad Wind, without so much as a lousy box of chocolates. And the Big Bad Wind huffed and puffed to blow the sukkah down, and although it did rattle the door and blow down s'chach and decorations, it could not blow down the sukkah. And the shlemazel rejoiced at finally outsmarting the Big Bad Wind. But the Big Bad Wind just laughed at the shlemazel and spoke: "You simple shlemazel, you think this is all I have up my sleeve? I may not be able to blow down your sukkah, but I will cause you to run like a scared bunny into your house."

And the Big Bad Wind summoned his associates: first Arctic Air, and then Bees and Rain to harass the shlemazel in his sukkah. Although he got stung by Bees or frozen to the bone, or drenched by the Rain until he caught a very bad cold, the shlemazel would not retreat indoors, and for the remainder of Sukkot he ate his meals in his sukkah.

And so, every year, during the holiday of Sukkot, the Big Bad Wind and his associates Arctic Air, Bees and Rain do battle with the shlemazel's family and all other families with sukkahs.

Vignettes of Babylon

Waters of Babylon, by Avner Meiri (Lugus Press (no price indicated)).

Jews and Iraq have had a long and tangled history. It was the country of the exile after the Temple was destroyed in 586 BCE. There, the great Babylonian Talmud was created. In subsequent centuries it remained the only large Jewish community outside the Roman Empire with its own political head, the rosh ha-golah, the prince of the exile. During the Middle Ages and into relatively modern times, Jews were unmolested by the Muslim majority and enjoyed relative prosperity and cultural identity.

The rise of Nazism in Europe led to anti-Jewish feeling and the terrible pogrom of June 1941 when 180 Jews were killed and much property destroyed. Soon after the creation of Israel, almost all Iraqi Jews left for renewed hope in a new land.

The author of this slim volume of vignettes is a native of Baghdad, where he served as a teacher in Jewish community schools. The stories reflect the traditions, folklore and many-sided relationship between Iraqi Jews and Arabs a half century ago. The unpretentious, quickly-read stories are filled with provocative detail, as seen through the eyes of an inquisitive young boy. They are often amusing with surprise endings and are redolent of a former age and an exotic setting.

By the waters of Babylon and throughout exile, the tower of David in Jerusalem was always the centre of Jewish yearning.

Finding Jewish records in Utah

Roots & Remembrance

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

There's an ordinary-looking, four-story white stone building in the heart of Salt Lake City, Utah, that could be considered one of the wonders of the modern world.

Situated at 35 North West Temple St., the building is not nearly as grandiose as the temple across the street that Mormon pioneers erected in the last century. Nor is it as well-known as the nearby 6,500-seat Mormon Tabernacle, home of the legendary Mormon Tabernacle Choir.

But for most genealogists, there's no better place to do family tree research. The building, the Family History Library of the LDS or Mormon Church, holds vital records for an astonishing proportion of the human race, including the Jews. Whether your Jewish roots extend back to Poland, Lithuania, Hungary, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Germany, France, England or other countries, chances are reasonably good you'll find microfilmed family records in Salt Lake City. (The collection is weak for most republics of the former Soviet Union.)

The Family History Library is the main public repository for nearly two million rolls of microfilm and perhaps as many sheets of microfiche. Church officials estimate they possess information on more than two billion people who lived within the last 400 years.

Since 1938, teams of LDS photographers have been traveling the world, microfilming birth, marriage, death, baptism, naturalization, census, military and other records pertaining to most nations, ethnic groups and religions. At present, some 200 LDS camera technicians are filming in more than 40 countries, sending back about 60,000 rolls of microfilmed records to Utah each year.

Only the most commonly used microfilms are housed in the library. The rest and all master negatives are stored under optimum conditions of humidity, temperature and light in the Granite Mountain Records Vault in a mountain outside Salt Lake City.

According to LDS spokesperson Thomas Daniels, church officials estimate that written records of one sort or another exist somewhere on Earth for at least one-tenth of the estimated 70 billion people who have ever lived. "We have two or 2.5 billion names in our collection, so we're perhaps one-third of the way towards getting all the names of those for whom records have been kept," says Daniels.

The Mormons have gone to such extraordinary lengths to build the world's foremost genealogical library because of their belief in the permanence of family ties. All adherents are required to chart at least four generations of their family trees, then perform a religious rite called "sealing," essentially a form of posthumous baptism, to join spouses, children and ancestors together in the hereafter. Although they are supposed to perform this ritual only for their own ancestors, LDS officials admitted last year that a few overzealous church members had performed the ritual using the names of Holocaust victims. After receiving Jewish protests, they stopped the practice.

Everyone is welcome to use the LDS Family History Library. For researchers who can't make the trek to Salt Lake City, most library materials are available at minimal charge through thousands of branches in North America and Europe, including about 100 across Canada and more than 30 in southern Ontario.

About a decade ago, I visited the small LDS library in Etobicoke (416-621-4607) and ordered a microfilm of Jewish records from 1845 to 1865 from Konin, the Polish hometown of my Glicenstein ancestors. Soon after the microfilm arrived, I found a handwritten, largely indecipherable document in which the name Glicensztayn appeared repeatedly. At first, all I knew for sure about the document was that it was dated 1846.

Aided by the excellent Translation Guide to 19th-Century Polish-Language Civil Registration Documents: Births, Marriages and Deaths, edited by Judith Frazin, I determined that I had found the marriage record for my great-great-grandparents, Raphael and Rudeszc Glicenzstayn. The document provided a wealth of family information, including the names of my third great-grandparents. I've since uncovered hundreds of other family documents and constructed a massive family tree with dates going back inferentially to the 1750s.

Many Jewish researchers around the world are now using these records. As mentioned in an earlier column, many are also involved in the massive indexing project known as REIPP (Russian Era Indexing of Poland Project). For details, send an e-mail query to [reipp2@jewishgen.org] or write to 25 Cathedral Circle, Nashua, NH 03063-2716. To reach the LDS Library in Salt Lake City, call 800-453-3860.

Sunnybrook hospital gets Jewish chapel

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The largest hospital in Ontario, Sunnybrook Health Science Centre, now has a synagogue, the first ever built in a hospital.

Though it didn't open officially until Oct. 1, the Sunnybrook Jewish Chapel had a service led by Rabbi Barry Schneider of Beth Emeth Synagogue on the second day of Rosh Hashanah, attended by 60 patients and staff, including war veterans in wheel chairs, and one in a hospital bed.

This synagogue is special in many ways. It serves the 40 disabled Jewish veterans who live in the hospital and are the special concern of members of the General Wingate branch of the Canadian Legion. It also serves a hospital which has more Jewish patients, doctors and other staff than any other hospital in Ontario.

To tie it in to the community's total resources, Rabbi Schneider, the hospital's voluntary chaplain for the past 15 years, plans a minyan once a week, or even more often, with the help of volunteers from youth groups and other synagogues.

Along with a handsome ark designed by Ron Henig, the chapel will eventually have 12 stained glass windows depicting seasons of the Jewish calendar. Its podium-lectern can be turned mechanically into a table for study purposes, to save space.

As the chapel is a place for prayer, study and reading, Rabbi Schneider is enthusiastic about its potential for Jews and non-Jews alike. A state-of-the-art medical ethics library, perhaps the first of its kind in Canada, is planned for the chapel.

The synagogue is designed to be flexible enough to accommodate wheel chairs or hospital beds.

It is expected that the chapel will be used as much by the approximately 250 Jewish patients and staff for yahrtzeit as by the veterans who were the inspiration for its building.

"It would not have been possible without the active support and cooperation of Rev. Alan Tipping, the retired chief of the hospital's pastoral services, and Rev. Bob Hunt, the coordinating chaplain," said Rabbi Schneider.

Two members of Beth Emeth, Ralph Snow, chapel committee chair, and Dave Smuschkowitz, head of fundraising and construction, have been key players. A generous donation from Leslie Dan helped the project.

The synagogue, which includes a counselling and meditation room, is on the ground floor of E wing and is accessible from all parts of the huge hospital, including K wing where the war veterans live. It has its own sukkah patio.

The chapel honors the memory of Harvey Lister (1920-1991), former president of Steeles Memorial Chapel and a long-standing member of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada and the General Wingate branch.

Cantor Bagley assumes rabbi's duties at Beth Radom

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Cantor David Bagley

TORONTO — Beth Radom Congregation has hired its first full-time spiritual leader, renowned chazzan David Bagley, who will serve as both rabbi and cantor to the North York synagogue.

Cantor Bagley, whose operatic tenor has earned him an international reputation, took on his new duties in August.

He made time for an interview — with surprising ease, given the timing of the request — three days prior to Rosh Hashanah. Three weeks into the job, he had already organized a seven-person choir of men and women conducted by his wife Klara, prepared his High Holy Day sermons, instituted regular afternoon services and dusted off his smichah.

"I've been a rabbi since I was 19 years old," he said, smiling. Born in Vilna, he escaped Europe with his family as a child. At the beginning of World War II, they fled to Japan and then to Shanghai, China, where he studied at the Mir Yeshivah.

Bagley immigrated to the United States as a teenager and obtained smichah at Yeshiva Beth Yosef Novardok in Brooklyn, he said.

His career as a synagogue cantor has taken him to Mexico, Israel and South Africa. In the latter two countries, he was affiliated with, respectively, the Great Synagogue of Ramat Gan and the Oxford Synagogue in Johannesburg. Most recently, he served at Chevra Kadisha B'nai Jacob in Montreal.

No stranger to Toronto, he is past president of the Toronto Council of Chazzanim and served two stints — a total of about 15 years — at Beth Sholom Congregation. Cantorial concerts and recordings have also been an integral component of his career.

Cantor Bagley laments the decline of professional chazzanut, a subject he expounded on at length, noting with alarm the increasing number of synagogues to forego the services of professional chazzanim, some for financial reasons, others for ideological ones. The trend poses "a danger to the continuity" of the traditional melodies used in Ashkenazi services, melodies he sees as a unifying force for the community.

"When we have a problem with the law, we look for the best lawyers," argued Cantor Bagley. "The chazzan is the lawyer of the congregation. That's why he faces the Ark. He faces G-d."

In his new dual role, Cantor Bagley hopes to continue to "serve humanity and Judaism."

With a membership of over 300 families, the recently renovated Beth Radom has come into its own as a synagogue in the past few years. This year, there was a waiting list for High Holy Day tickets.

The North York congregation began life as a landsmanshaft and evolved to meet the changing needs of its membership, now a mix of young families and original members.

A Conservative synagogue affiliated with the New York-based United Synagogue umbrella, Beth Radom is "a traditional congregation," said Cantor Bagley, who described himself as a traditional man.

The highest form of charity

Special to the CJN

TORONTO – New Jersey resident Alisa Flatow was only 4½ years old when she decided she wanted to study at a yeshivah later in life. Still attracted to Judaism as a teenager, she travelled frequently to Israel to study religion in Jerusalem.

Last year, while on her sixth such trip, the 20-year-old woman was killed by a terrorist explosion that also took the lives of seven Israeli soldiers.

"What I learned from this, basically, is that Jews care for each other," Stephen Flatow, Alisa's father, told an audience in Toronto recently. "We are responsible for each other's well-being. Many people reached out to us in our grief. And we have an obligation not to let personal tragedies like this interfere with our beliefs. You keep going forward, especially as a Jew."

Speaking at a fundraising event for Israel Bonds, Flatow explained that his daughter died after a terrorist bomb ripped a bus apart while she was visiting a resort in the Gaza Strip. Several friends who were travelling with her survived the blast.

A frequent lecturer for the Bonds organization, Flatow said that Alisa's strong interest in Judaism deepened her family's Jewish faith over the years, and that it was that same faith that had helped them cope with the tragedy of her murder.

The family has started the Alisa Flatow Memorial Fund, he said, to provide scholarships to college-aged students from North America to study Judaism in Israel.

"I believe personally that it is a Jewish obligation to help other Jews, and the highest form of charity is to go into business with someone who is a little bit down on their luck. That's where Israel Bonds come in.

"In essence, you're helping people get by. You're helping them free up their resources so they can do something else with the money. This is a loan, it's not a free gift. It's important to support Israel Bonds as a way of showing our unity."

Flatow spoke in the home of David and Luba Smuschkowitz, who were the honorees and the hosts of the event, which drew more than 100 guests.

David Smuschkowitz was instrumental in building the Holocaust Centre in the Lipa Green Building in North York and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem Memorial in Earl Bales Park. He is also a major force behind the new Jewish chapel in Sunnybrook Health Science Centre.

Child abuse under-reported, coalition says

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Large" numbers of "seriously" abused and neglected children still go unreported, a coalition of children's aid societies warned last week.

The coalition, which includes Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) joined Metro's two other children's aid societies and Metro Chairman Allan Tonks in proclaiming October Child Abuse Prevention Month.

Child abuse in Metro "is seriously under-reported," coalition spokesperson Gordon Wolfe told a news conference. More aggressive reporting of child abuse and neglect "is crucial" to understanding the problem and helping children at risk, said Wolfe, executive director of JF&CS. "Without a report, there is no possibility of help."

Last year, Metro's children's aid societies served 31,000 children and 17,000 families. The coalition estimates that one in 17 children receives assistance from JF&CS, Catholic Children's Aid or Metro's Children's Aid Society.

Metro Chairman Allan Tonks (centre) holds the proclamation of October as Child Abuse Prevention Month. He's flanked by Dr. Paul Steinhauer (left) and JF&CS director Gordon Wolfe.

In the Jewish community, 270 allegations of child abuse were investigated by JF&CS in 1995. The agency also had 82 children in its care.

Wolfe cited a poll in the United States showing the number of physical abuse victims is more than 16 times the number of reported cases. For sexual abuse, the figure is 10 times the number of officially reported cases.

Metro's proclamation came on the heels of the announcement by Queen's Park of a task force to probe child abuse deaths in Ontario.

The alliance cited a report on child poverty in Metro showing that one in three children under 18 and living at home relied on social assistance. Fully 80 percent of children served by agencies live at or below the poverty line, and over 40 percent of Metro's food bank users are under 19.

Wolfe said more than half of the Metro agencies' services were provided to single-parent families, which are most likely to be poor.

"The relationship between poverty and child neglect has been well documented," he noted.

Provincial budget cuts are increasing child abuse in Metro, said Dr. Paul Steinhauer, a child psychiatrist.

He said once all cuts sink in — including the 20 percent reduction in social assistance and the end of rent controls — more children "will be lacking the basic skills needed to survive."

Vancouver teen elected president of B'nai Brith Girls

TORONTO — Seventeen-year-old Nava Mizrachi of Vancouver has been elected international n'siah (president) of B'nai Brith Girls (BBG) of B'nai B'rith Youth Organization (BBYO), the world's largest international Jewish youth organization.

Mizrachi, who has already received over 20 academic, community and organizational awards, attributes her passion for helping others to her strong Jewish background.

Her duties as international n'siah include travelling across North America, Europe and Israel and assisting the local programs in achieving their goals for the upcoming year.

"I love trying to inspire and motivate others," she says. "All I wanted was the opportunity. Now that I have it, I'm not going to waste a second of it."

Mizrachi is the fourth Canadian to be voted in as president of the 52-year-old BBG.

BBYO in Canada will be returning to a structure whereby the Canadian regions will once again be supervised by BBYO International in the United States. BBYO International had fully funded the BBYO national structure over the last 3½ years, in order to ensure the stability of local programs during a transitional period, after funding of local BBYO programs was severed by B'nai Brith Canada.

BBYO International will continue to work with federations and Jewish community centres in providing programs in different communities. BBYO International will retain its commitment to Canadian Jewish teens through direct supervision and provision of resources to individual local programs.

Barak urges Netanyahu 'to pull toward the centre'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Ehud Barak, the man trying to succeed Shimon Peres as leader of the Labor party, said last week he will support Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu if he pursues "pragmatic policies."

Barak, the former chief of staff who was briefly foreign minister after Yitzhak Rabin's assassination last November, said that Netanyahu's "only real alternative" is "to pull toward the centre."

Characterizing Netanyahu as "quite a pragmatic person," Barak, who was his commanding officer in the army, urged Netanyahu not "to break his head on the rock of reality."

Barak, however, criticized, Netanyahu's foreign policy record after 100 days in office. He claimed that Israel's relations with the Palestine Authority have become "tenuous" and that its ties with Egypt have fallen to "an all-time low."

Tension with Syria has flared in Lebanon, while Arab states in the Persian Gulf have frozen their relations with Israel, he said.

Barak, who recently announced his candidacy for the Labor party's top post, spoke to a capacity audience at Holy Blossom Temple. He was in Toronto under the auspices of UJA Federation.

In a blunt, wide-ranging speech, Barak suggested that Israel is powerful enough to take risks for the sake of peace.

"Israel has never been stronger," he declared, citing its military might, its nuclear deterrent, its economic strength and its strategic relations with the United States, the only super power.

Barak, who praised Rabin and Peres for having launched the current peace process, described peace as a "vital interest" rather than a "luxury," not only for Israel but for the Arabs.

Paraphrasing the late John F. Kennedy, Barak said, "Let us never fear to negotiate."

However, Barak said he had no illusions about the peace process. "The Palestinians are still dreaming about our disappearance," he acknowledged. But Israel can defend itself because "we're strong enough."

Taking a question from the floor following his formal address, Barak disputed a contention that the PLO had failed to abrogate its national covenant, which calls for Israel's destruction.

"To the best of my knowledge," he said, "it was cancelled." And the Palestine Authority, he added, has pledged that the PLO's new charter will not contradict the Oslo accords.

Still, Barak said, he prefers to regulate Israel's relationship with the Palestinians through a policy of separation.

For now, because Israel and the Palestinians have yet to fully normalize their relations, " high fences-make good neighbors," he noted.

Barak said it is not in Israel's interests to maintain a permanent grip on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, with its 2.5 million Palestinian Arabs.

"For Israel to control all the territories is to create a binational or apartheid state." Is this the dream of Zionism? he asked rhetorically.

"The choices are not between 'peace with security' or 'security with peace,' " he said, referring to the election campaign slogans of the Labor party and the Likud bloc, "but between democracy and apartheid."

Turning to the thorny and still unresolved issue of Hebron, from which Israel is obliged to make a partial withdrawal, Barak said that the Palestine Authority rather than Israel should administer the 100,000 Arabs who live there.

Israel, he said, should control the Jewish enclaves in Hebron, which he called "the cradle of our civilization and traditions."

Jews have a right to settle in the territories. But in order to achieve peace with the Arabs, he said, "we have to find a point of equilibrium."

Dismissing the far-right notion that Israel can expel, or transfer, Palestinans from the territories, Barak said it was "morally impossible and politically impractical."

Touching on Jerusalem, Barak heatedly denied that the Labor party sought to divide the city. "We're determined to keep Jerusalem united, under our control."

Claiming that Jews in Israel and the Diaspora have "grown apart," Barak called on both parties "to redefine their relationship."

He urged Jews to visit Israel more frequently, to teach their children Hebrew and to invest in Israel, "our shared future."

And while Jews outside Israel have a responsibility to be involved in Israel's affairs, they do not have the right "to tell us what to do."

In other comments, Barak left a rosy impression of the current state of Israel's economy, categorized Soviet immigrants as "superb human capital" and applauded the resiliency of Israeli democracy in the wake of Rabin's murder.

enforce it on them," he warned.

As part of a final settlement with the Palestinians, Israel should retain the eastern sector of Jerusalem (which Israel annexed in 1967), keep the Gush Etzion bloc, straighten its borders in northern Samaria, widen the corridor to Jerusalem and maintain a military presence along the Jordan River.

Furthermore, no foreign armies should be stationed west of the Jordan River, and Palestinian refugees should not have the right to return.

"It's a wider Allon Plan," he explained, referring to a formula worked out by Yigal Allon, Israel's late foreign minister.

Barak also believes that the majority of Jewish settlers in the territories should live under "Israel's control."

He was not prepared to say whether Israel should relinquish the Golan Heights in exchange for a full-fledged peace treaty with Syria.

"The only card we have is the depth of a withdrawal from the Golan," he said.

"We demand from the Syrians full peace, with normalization, security arrangements, early warning systems, water rights, curbs on terrorism and a solution in [southern] Lebanon."

Early this year, Barak spent two days talking with Syria's chief of staff in Washington, and at the end of their conversations he was not convinced that Syria would or could meet Israel's demands.

Reacting to a report that Rabin had notified the United States that he was willing to withdraw to the June 4, 1967 lines with Syria in return for a fullblown peace treaty. Barak dismissed the story as untrue. Rabin, however, was prepared to take "far-reaching risks," Barak noted.

Turning to southern Lebanon, Barak said Israel should not unilaterally pull out of its self-declared security zone there, unless the withdrawal is made within the context of agreements with Syria and Lebanon.

As for Yasser Arafat's record in containing terrorism, Barak said his performance of late has markedly improved. "He's doing much more than two years ago."

In Barak's judgment, the Palestine Authority is essentially in compliance with the Oslo accords.

"Here and there are technical violations. But basically, it's a promising and successful process," he said in reference to Israel's budding relationship with the Palestinians of the territories. (Barak spoke just as the latest violence in the territories got under way).

Barak has no doubt that Israel will comply with the Oslo agreements and deploy from Hebron, albeit with "cosmetic changes."

"We are the most powerful player in the Middle East in terms of military and strategic capabilities. We are perceived by the Arabs to have a nuclear capability. We have a huge economy. All these elements make us stronger, and we should use this leverage in pursuit of peace."

Israel Experience head office moves to Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel experience programs will have a new Canadian home as of Oct. 1. The newly formed Canada Israel Experience Centre (CIEC) will share office space with the United Israel Appeal (UIA)/Council of Jewish Federations office in Toronto.

The formation of the new entity marks significant change in two areas: the national umbrella office for Israel Experience programs is now located in Toronto, not Montreal; and it is now formally affiliated with the federation system, the umbrella group for local Jewish communities.

Until now, Israel Experience programs were run on a national basis out of Montreal's Youth & Hechalutz (Y&H) office, a department of the Canadian Zionist Federation managed for the last decade by Linda Israel. The department, which sent about 600 young people to Israel last year, had seven constituent offices across the country, one of which was located in Toronto.

The new Toronto office replaces the Montreal office on a national level (locally, FEDERATION CJA has assumed responsibility for Israel experience trips); at a local level in Toronto, the new office will provide resource services formerly offered by the Israel Youth Program Centre (IYPC), whose office in the Bathurst Jewish Centre is closing in order to be integrated into the CIEC.

"There was a need for everyone to work together," said Israel during a recent visit to Toronto to help ease the transition. She called the move "a logical step," given also the larger size of Toronto's Jewish population and the location of the UIA office.

Michael Soberman of the IYPC will work in the new office as Ontario Israel Experience director; Liz Sokolsky, 37, former national director of B'nai Brith Youth Organization, has been appointed national executive director. Also on staff will be Adam Minsky, national director of education and a former leader on Y&H Israel trips. An administrative assistant and a Jewish Agency shaliach (scheduled to arrive in November) will also be based there.

The CIEC is affiliated with CZF/Youth & Hechalutz Jerusalem, the CRB Foundation, UIA Canada and the Council of Jewish Federations. It is also connected with New York-based Israel Experience Inc., a newly created North American umbrella for Israel Experience offices.

The function of the CIEC will be to promote and market Israel Experience programs for high school and university-age students, said Sokolsky. Its mandate will also include creating new programs to attract unaffiliated Jewish youth.

"The Israel Experience is an integral part of [students'] informal Jewish education," said Sokolsky. She hopes the CIEC will become "almost like a Yellow Pages" for the different programs available.

I BELIEVE

I BELIEVE that our principles, our rights and our freedom are protected because of the power of our community's collective voice.

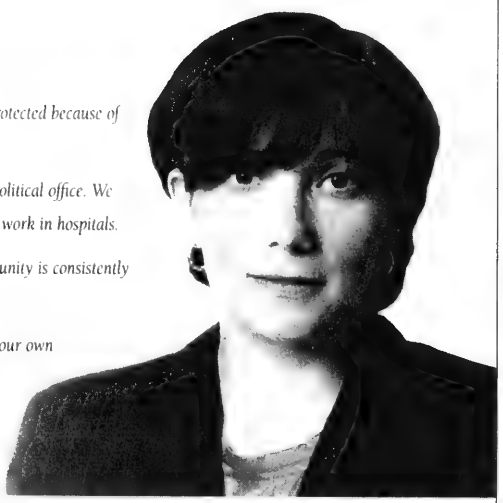
Not long ago, Jews could not own homes in certain areas. Few of us held political office. We were barred from some public facilities, and most Jewish doctors could not work in hospitals.

Today, these restrictions are not tolerated. In large part because our community is consistently vocal on the critical issues that affect Jews here and abroad.

We speak out against what's wrong. And we speak up for what's right. On our own behalf, and on behalf of others.

I believe UJA Federation is the most efficient means of ensuring that what we value — as a Jewish community — is translated into effective action. Now. And always.



Carole Sterling

Through its funding of Canadian Jewish Congress, UJA Federation supports essential principles of Jewish life: Democracy, justice, pluralism and freedom. It fights antisemitism, promotes government funding for day schools, works to free Jews from oppression, and promotes human rights.

Advocacy is vital to our safety and security. But we need more money for our efforts. Resources can only come from one place: Our community. Each and every one of us.

FOR OUR COMMUNITY. FOR ISRAEL.
FOR OUR CHILDREN. FOREVER.

Experts clash over Nazi doctors

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A visiting expert's contention that doctors in Nazi Germany were primarily used by Hitler as a "cover" for his war on Jews was challenged here by two university professors.

The opinion of Dr. Henry Friedlander of City University of New York, who survived Auschwitz and other death camps as a young man and wrote Origins of Nazi Genocide, sparked a lively debate at the Hannah seminar on the history of medicine at the University of Toronto recently.

The analysis by Friedlander failed to give enough weight to the eager participation of German doctors in furthering Hitler's plans said Prof. Michael Kater, a York University history professsor and author of Doctors Under Hitler.

"One out of two male physicians in Germany was a member of the Nazi party," Kater said. These doctors were anxious to oust Jewish physicians who made up 10 percent of the total, he added.

Friedlander, himself the son of a Berlin doctor, downplayed Nazi ideology "as a crucial ingredient," argued University of Toronto history professor Michael Marris. The New York visitor also failed to make clear the link between the early eugenic killings authorized by Hitler and the final solution of mass killings of Jews, Marris said.

While agreeing that Hitler's main attack was against the Jews, Friedlander said the German physicians and university medical professors were co-opted by Hitler to give legitimacy to Nazi policy. Important motives for the doctors included their desire to be at the centre of events, to get salary and fringe benefits, including travel with their wives, "all the things of carreerism," Friedlander said.

One of several Holocaust survivors who attended the seminar deplored the fact that there was no outcry from the German public when the extermination of Jews became known.

Freidlander said Hitler used the killing of the handicapped and mental defectives in the early days of the Nazi regime as a "model" for the later death camps.

"They wanted to pipe gas into the hospital wards but were warned by chemists that it wouldn't work. So they developed the gas chamber and cremated the bodies, after taking gold teeth and bridgework from the victims."

Yiddish heritage studied

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It may be a long way from Kolomyya in Bukovina, Romania, to Toronto, but, through learning Yiddish, Claudia Bickel hopes to make the journey.

The Toronto woman, now studying Yiddish at the University of Toronto, is a granddaughter of famed Yiddish Romanian writer and critic Shlomo Bickel, but she has never been able to read the 10 books he has written or edited.

When she grew up in New Haven, Conn., no Yiddish was spoken in their home. "I really didn't know anything about my Jewish identity," she said. Her late father, Alexander, died when she was 12. He taught constitutional law at Yale, was a "real American" and her mother, Joanne, an Italian-American living in New York, is non-Jewish.

Bickel, a writer of fiction and poetry, who attended Haverford College in Pennsylvania, and went on to graduate school at the School of Medieval Studies at U of T, became interested in her Jewish roots as her education progressed.

She was delighted to find a laudatory entry in Encylcopedia Judaica about her grandfather who came to New York in 1939 and was literary editor of the Yiddish daily Der Tog.

His most famous book A Shtot Mit Yidn, a City of Jews, was about the lives of ordinary Jews in Kolomyya. Bikel was an active Labor Zionist and was editor of Di Freyheyt, the organ of the Poale Zion of Bukovina. He was an officer in the Austrian Army in World War I.

His granddaughter attended a six-week Yiddish course at Columbia University, New York, this past summer. She is one of three winners of scholarships sponsored by Friends of Yiddish, Workmen's Circle and the Zukerman Charitable Foundation to attend the course. The other winners are Sharon Grainer and Benjamin Nemerofsky-Ramsay.

Claudia Bickel says she is stronger in reading and writing Yiddish than in speaking it but her conversational skills are increasing and she is looking for opportunities to speak Yiddish. Her honorary membership in Friends of Yiddish and their conversation club will help.

"I'm excited about eventually being able to read my grandfather's books," she said.

This is her second year in Yiddish studies at the U of T with teacher Ellie Kellman.

At a recent Friends of Yiddish breakfast meeting, she sat entranced, listening to a reading of a Shalom Aleichem story by Nathan Garnick. "I was able to follow some of the Yiddish but his English summaries helped a lot."

Controversial judge will step down

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish groups applauded Quebec Superior Court judge Jean Bienvenue's decision to retire following a Canadian Judicial Council recommendation that he be removed from the bench.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Goldie Hershon said it was "the right thing to do under the circumstances," adding that Bienvenue's apology to the Jewish community was "simply insufficient."

B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) spokesperson Stephen Scheinberg agreed the judge's stepping down was, not only appropriate, but "the best judgment Justice Bienvenue has shown during his tenure on the bench.

"We are just sorry that the resolution of this issue took such a long time and that the legal avenues to his removal were so very cumbersome."

Had he not left, Bienvenue's future was in the hands of Justice Minister Allan Rock who would have had to decide whether to recommend to Parliament that the judge be ousted.

Only Parliament, by joint resolution of the House of Commons and the Senate, can fire a federally appointed judge. It would have been the first time in history such a vote had been put to Parliament. The council, established in 1971, has never previously recommended a judge's removal.

The council, by a vote of 22-7, endorsed an earlier five-member inquiry committee's majority finding that Bienvenue had become "incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of the office of judge." The council, chaired by Supreme Court Chief Justice Antonio Lamer, is composed of the chief and associate chief justices of federally appointed courts across Canada.

"We find the judge has shown an aggravating lack of sensitivity to the communities and individuals offended by his remarks or conduct. In addition — the evidence could not be any clearer — Mr. Justice Bienvenue does not intend to change his behavior in any way," the council report states.

The inquiry was held in response to complaints about the behavior of Bienvenue last December in Trois-Rivieres during the trial and sentencing of Tracy Theberge for murder, and specifically his comments concerning women and Jews.

He stated that millions of Jews died without pain or suffering in the gas chambers and that women can "sink to depths to which even the vilest man could not sink."

As well, according to the inquiry committee report released in July, the judge inappropriately criticized the jury's performance and competence.

The council found Bienvenue has "undermined public confidence in him and strongly contributed to destroying public confidence in the judicial system ...

"It is essential to the integrity of the administration of justice that the public have confidence in the impartiality of the judiciary ..."

Bienvenue, 68, a one-time Liberal education and immigration minister, had been a Superior Court judge since 1977.

The Bienvenue affair points to the need for reform of how judges are disciplined, according to BBC senior counsel David Matas. "A recommendation from the Canadian Judicial Council should be sufficient given that every Superior Court judge sits on the council and given the number of judges now presiding in Canada.

"Also, it would be unprofessional to remove a judge through Parliamentary debate, as it becomes a matter of politics, not confidence."

CJC Quebec region chair Reisa Teitelbaum hopes this episode will lead to clearer guidelines on the behavior of judges.

Journalist interviewed Schindler

MONTREAL — The first known journalist to interview Oskar Schindler — veteran Montreal newsman Herbert Steinhouse — died Sept. 21 at age 74.

Steinhouse's 1948 meeting with Schindler, whose name achieved legendary status following the release of Steven Spielberg's acclaimed 1993 film, Schindler's List, was just the start of a varied career as a journalist, novelist and broadcaster that spanned more than 40 years.

For 30 of those years, starting in 1957, Steinhouse, with omnipresent pipe in hand and distinguished good looks, worked at the Montreal CBC, as a public affairs producer, in public relations, director of English-language programming, and as the man charged with establishing radio and television transmitters and receivers to regions across the province.

But Steinhouse scooped the world as the first man to document the exploits of Schindler, a German industrialist credited with saving the lives of hundreds of Jews he hired as factory workers.

He is survived by his wife, Tobie (Davis), and sons Stephan and Adam.

'Hope' gave survivor the strength to carry on

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The memory of what Gerda Weissmann Klein thought of as "just another boring evening at home" as a young girl sustained her through the nightmare of three long years in German labor camps, hunger and finally, a gruelling death march.

Klein never abandoned hope that one day, she would be back in that living room with her family.

It was not to be. She was the sole survivor.

Weissmann Klein spoke to close to 200 guests at a recent State of Israel Bonds Women's Division luncheon honoring Fay Schmerling and her mother, Zelda Rostoker.

The author of All But My Life, the autobiography on which the Oscar-winning documentary You are Free is based, spoke of her early years in Poland and showed several scenes from the film.

She noted that even during the Holocaust, Jews "never lost their pride in who they were," and that "even under the most unspeakable conditions, there was friendship, there was love and there was sharing."

During her three years in a labor camp, which housed 2,000 girls from all walks of life, there were no suicides, Weissman Klein said, and "not one nervous breakdown, and although we were always hungry, no one gave up hope.

"I hope that this time, too, with the help of G-d, Israel will survive. "You must celebrate every opportunity to help our people."

Weissman Klein was introduced by Women's Division vice-chair Sandra Fuss and thanked by Sylvia Klein, who also spoke on behalf of Israel Bonds. In her tribute to the honorees, Isabel Strub recalled Zelda Rostoker as a tireless worker on behalf of Zionist and local Jewish causes, and spoke of Schmerling "as a person who can be relied upon ... who "had learned from the words of wisdom of her mother," and who "loves to learn, loves to teach and loves to live a Jewish life."

Schmerling thanked her mother for being a "wonderful role model, whose motto was not 'live and let live,' but 'live and help live,' " while Rostoker drew laughter when she exclaimed "I never thought I should live so long to hear such words from my daughter!"

The presentation was made by Judy Schwartz, and Hamilton Bonds Women's Division chair Flora Rams gave the welcoming remarks. Immediate past Women's Division chair Stephanie McLean also spoke.

Chargé d'affaires gets new position

By MIRIAM VALE
CJN Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – Only a few weeks into his job as chargé d'affaires at Israel's embassy in Ottawa, Chen Ivri is about to change titles.

Ivri, who assumed the post Aug. 1, will become Counsellor at the embassy once Israel's new ambassador, David Sultan, takes over on Oct. 17.

Sultan arrived in Ottawa last week.

Ivri took over as chargé d'affaires from Eli Yerushalmi, who returned to Israel in August and had served as Israel's acting ambassador.

These days Ivri is familiarizing himself with his new home.

"I'm in the process of learning," he says, adding that his first goal has been to connect with the Canadian Jewish community and the government, especially Foreign Affairs.

On July 31, an Israeli delegation, including Ivri and Israeli trade minister Natan Sharansky, attended the signing in Toronto of the free trade agreement between Canada and Israel. Ivri says the agreement can only strengthen Israeli-Canadian ties.

"It's a sign that [there will be] more agreements in various fields."

He says the event was a "milestone in the historic relations between the two countries."

In order to acquaint himself with the Canadian Jewish community, Ivri has visited synagogues in Toronto and Ottawa and has attended cultural events. He says he's especially impressed with the level of organization in Canada's Jewish community.

"It's an internationally organized community. And the community accepts us warmly with friendship."

Previously, Ivri served as the first secretary for the Latin American division of the Israeli Foreign Ministry. He says he's looking forward to applying his knowledge to his new post.

"Every diplomat brings something besides the message that his colleagues bring," Ivri says. "He brings his own personality."

גידי קורן

דוחפים את ביבי לשלום:

כשניסו להסביר מדוע נוצח שמעון פרס, אדריכל השלום, בבחירות האחרונות, הסכימו רוב המפרשים כי מרבית הציבור בישראל סָבר שהוא צעד במהירות גדולה מידי לקראת עראפת. על כן כל -כך הפתיע אותי הלחץ הציבורי על נתניהו לנוע במהירות מיד אחרי הבחירות. הלחץ לא היה רק מצד אנשי השמאל, אלא גם מצד אנשי מרכז וימין. אני אישית סברתי שחודשיים וחצי הם זמן בהחלט סביר ללמוד בזהירות את המצב, את הצעדים , את הטריקים, אבל לא במזרח התיכון! באמצע אוגוסט הודיע הנשיא וויזמן שאם לא נתניהו, יהיה זה הוא שיפגוש את עראפת. מקץ שבוע למד נתניהו לדעת שאם לא יפגוש את עראפת אין לו מה לנסוע לוושינגטון. בקיצור - איש הימין, שהצהיר לפני הבחירות שלא יפגוש את מנהיג אש"ף נאלץ לפגוש אותו קפוא שד. הביקורת הקשה שספג נתניהו מאנשי הימין בעקבות לחיצת היד עם עראפת מלמדת עד כמה קשה מצבו. מאידך גיסא, היא מבטיחה עכשיו שגם הימין מכיר בזכותם של הפלשתינאים לטריטוריה משלהם וישות משלהם. כלומר- לכשיישיג נתניהו את השלום הסופי יסכימו לו כולם, בעוד שאם פרס היה משיג את השלום, היו נתניהו ואנשיו מתנגדים לו. סך הכל סידור לא רע.

הרפת של דגניה ב':

דגניה היא כזכור הקיבוץ הראשון בהסטוריה האנושית, ומטבע העניין זכתה הרפת של דגניה לתיעודים שונים בדפי ההסטוריה של המאה העשרים הציונית. עכשיו, רוצים אתם לדעת מה יש ברפת של דגניה בקיץ 96? שלושה ניחושים, ארבעה ניחושים, עשרים ניחושים... מוותרים? ובכן, הרפת של דגניה ב' הפכה למרכז יופי וטיפוח לנשות הגליל העונה לשם " ביוטי שביט" בהנהלתו של המאפר גיורא שביט. תושבי הצפון יכולים עכשיו להשתלם בשעורי יופי ואיפור בכמה מקצועות. בסיום הקורס יקבלו הבוגרים תעודות איפור מקצועי. כמו כן יימכרו שם מוצרי קוסמטיקה ויינתנו טיפולים הוליסטיים ורפלקסולוגיה. אם מייסדי הקיבוץ יכולים לראות ממקום מנוחתם בגן עדן לאן הגיע הקיבוץ של היום - הם היו לבטח מתהפכים בקברם. אבל זהו חלק ממהפכה רצינית שעוברת על הקיבוץ בנסיונותיו להישאר בחיים כלכלית ובעיקר חברתית, ואני בטח עוד אגע בזה בעתיד.

ומה קרה לפָּרות, אתם בטח שואלים? העבירו אותן מן הרפת ההסטורית לרפת חדשה ומודרנית יותר.

לנהוג במכונית באוגוסט בישראל:

לעלות על הכביש ולנהוג במכונית בישראל בקיץ היא פעילות הרת סיכון. בכל נסיעה כזו, אפילו קצרה, מזומנת לך האפשרות לראות ארבע-חמש תאונות בחיתוליהן. אנשים חותכים מסלולים ממש סנטימטרים לפניך, איש לא נותן להיכנס מרחוב צדדי, כולם צופרים לכולם ומקללים את כולם, וכל יום מישהו נהרג בכביש ורבים נפצעים. חבר טוב אמר לי: העובדה שכל יום נהרג רק איש אחד ולא שישה, גם זו הוכחה לקיום האל.

כפר רופין, עמק בית שאן:

צבי ויזל קם כל יום בחמש בבוקר ומתחיל לעבוד בשש. הוא אוסף ממטרות מכל שטחי החקלאות במשק ומשפץ אותן, ובכך חוסך את הצורך לשלוח אותן לתיקון בעיר הגדולה, או לקנות ממטרות חדשות. סך הכל הוא חוסך בכל חודש כ- 10 אלפים שקלים, שהם כחמשת אלפים דולאר קנדיים. צבי עובד עד אחת בצהריים, כאשר הטמפרטורה בצל היא 42 מעלות ובשמש בערך 65 מעלות. אין בסיפור הזה אולי משהו מיוחד - קיבוצניק עובד למחייתו - מלבד העובדה שצבי ויזל נולד בשנת 1919 והוא ממשיך לעבוד בצורה יצרנית בגיל שבעים ושבע. והוא אינו יחיד. יש כמותו הרבה אנשים בהתיישבות העובדת, שעומדים כל יום להזכיר לישראל החדשה איך ישראל נראתה פעם, לפני שהפכה לסניף גדול של מקדונאלדס ושל הטלביזיה בכבלים.
